Of course we had to visit St. Patrick's Cathedral, which stands where the great saint of Erin is said to have baptized his converts. The original church which stood on this ground was built as early as the ninth century, for in 890 Gregory of Scotland, with his followers, attended worship in it. The present building was begun in 1190, and was largely added to in 1370. It is cruciform in shape, is an edifice of considerable pretensions, but falls far behind the cathedrals in the principal cities on the continent. In it, as usual in such institutions, are the tombs and memorials of distinguished departed greatness.

The old cathedral must have fallen considerably into decay or disrepair, for Benjamin L. Guinness, a wealthy brewer, gave the munificent sum of £150,000, or $750,000, to repair it and place it in its present condition. It was perhaps very fitting that a man who had made his fortune by making drunkards and administering to the debased passions of his fellow-men should give some of the proceeds of that bad business to fixing up one of the residences of the Virgin in which to worship the unknowable and non-existent God.

When Cromwell and his army of religious zealots came over to Ireland and brought the country into subjection he used St. Patrick's Cathedral as barracks for his men, who defaced some of the statues and other holy things belonging to the cathedral. The baptismal font was used for watering Cromwell's horses, and it is not for me to say this was not the most practical and sensible use it was ever put to. At all events, though Cromwell was excessively religious in his way, he seems to have had very little respect for the religious prejudices of the conquered Irish. In other cathedrals and churches in Ireland are pointed out the marks of desecration and injury perpetrated by Cromwell's men. In St. Patrick's Cathedral are much fewer images of saints, virgins, and dead Christs than are found in the cathedrals and churches on the continent, but there is quite sufficient in that line to meet all the wants of the Hibernian worshipers. It would seem that half a dozen images in one church ought to have as heavenly an effect as a hundred times that number.

Christ's Church Cathedral belongs to the Episcopalians, and is a rich and showy church. It was built many hundreds or years ago, but has recently been greatly improved and decorated by the munificence of a rich distiller, Mr. Henry Roe, who expended one million dollars upon it. Here we have another instance of money obtained by making drunkards and spreading misery among the sons and daughters of humanity, being used to enrich and ornament an edifice called a "house of God." Doubtless these men who have obtained their wealth by making their fellow-beings wretched hope to enter the gates of heaven by giving freely to the church of their ill-gotten gains, precisely as many bloody kings, dukes, earls, murderers and butchers, after spending a lifetime in shedding human blood and in crushing helpless, wretched beings into the very mire of the earth, imagined they could placate heaven and be able to join the select band of harpists in the upper air by giving freely to build some cathedral or church, pay for a stained window or two, a few statues, a monument, or something of the kind, with which they hoped to win the favor of heaven. Such are some of the vagaries with which what is called Christianity has infused the minds of men.

Dublin Castle lacks the imposing appearance of Edinburgh Castle, elevated on a pile of rocks over four hundred feet in hight, but was built hundreds of years ago as a place of security from the depredations and murderous attacks of neighboring warlike assailants. It has been changed much since built, and is now little more than barracks for soldiers, who are stationed here to overawe the Irish discontents.

Much more could be said about Dublin, with its pretty park, its pleasant streets, and fine edifices, but what has been said must suffice. It is a city of somewhat less than 250,000 inhabitants, and fell considerably away in importance, prosperity, and population when the parliament was discontinued here and removed to London in the year 1800. It has a limited number of manufactures, and these of insignificant importance.

Saturday, Aug. 20th—We left Dublin and took the train for Galway, 125 miles distant, on the west coast of Ireland. This took us through the central portion of the country and enabled us to see much more of the farming districts, stretch after stretch opening before us. For over seventy-five miles the country is very good, lying well, and tolerably well fenced. I must say, however, that the fencing in Ireland is not as good as in Scotland; the hedges often appear neglected and imperfect, and the stone walls are not as strong or high, and not so strong or high and not so generally laid in mortar.

For a large number of miles the country is mostly devoted to grazing for cattle and sheep, and but a small percentage of it is in grain and roots. This confirms what a gentleman in Dublin had remarked, that Ireland had degenerated into a mere grazing pasture for England. This is unfortunate for the poor people of the country who want labor, for but little labor is required to attend to a grazing farm, and consequently many thousands have been thrown out of employment. America is charged with having effected this by furnishing breadstuffs at so low a figure that stock-raising is more profitable than grain. The poor, however, feel grateful to America for supplying them with food, and know not what they could have done without America's help.

The bogs or peat-beds were often passed on this route, and in many places large piles of this fuel are piled up. We of course passed many little towns and villages. Conspicuous among them is Athlone, with 6,000 inhabitants, situated on the Shannon river and occupying about the geographical center of Ireland. It has an old tower, well overgrown with ivy, and which, with some additions, serves as barracks for soldiers. Previous to this we passed through the small town of Maynooth, the seat of a college of St. Patrick, for the education of young men designed for the Catholic clergy. Here are also the remains of an old castle, and in the neighborhood are round towers, or what is left of them. In many places the view of the surrounding fertile country is beautiful indeed, while in the distance the highlands present themselves. But for the last twenty-five miles or more before reaching Galway the country grows poorer, and rocks seem to be the principal product in many places. Large quantities of stone have been laid into walls, fencing the land off into small fields, but enough still remain on the land in many places to make twice as many more walls. In looking across the country when nearly on a level with the eye, little more than stone walls can be seen.

Galway is in a poor, rocky district, and stands at the head of Galway bay, some thirty miles in length. It is a town of about 14,000 inhabitants, and does not present a very flourishing appearanee, though a new dock is being constructed to enable vessels of heavy draft to come up to it, which has hitherto not been the case. We had an hour or two to look around here, and saw any number of human specimens of poverty and degradation. The people of Connemara, a poor district next north, come here to do their limited trading, bringing in whatever little stuff they may have to sell and take out some whisky and other supplies, and this, being Saturday, is their regular day for trading. We saw scores of women with red petticoats, a heavy blue cloak with a hood and large cape—all home-made—bare-footed, bare-legged, and bare-headed, and every one with a square basket, holding nearly a bushel, fastened to their back, in which to bring in a few eggs, a chicken or two, or whatever else they may have to sell, taking back a little tea, a piece of salt American pork, and a little whisky to cheer up their spirits. The blue cloak covers the basket, giving them a very humped-back or dromedary appearance, more like a band of rude gypsies of a thousand years ago than like civilized women of the nineteenth century. Their hair is disheveled and unkempt, their faces dark and dirty, their feet and legs ditto. Many of these miserable creatures walk in and back, a distance of more than thirty miles, with their pack-baskets on their backs, with perhaps not more than a dollar's worth or two to sell or exchange for what they want. Their feet must be as tough as the hide of the rhinoceros to walk on the sharp stones and flints which line the roads and paths. But they do not seem to mind it. They know no other mode of life, and possibly they enjoy it as well as the average of human beings, though large numbers have little or nothing to eat and are in a chronic state of starvation. When their little crop of potatoes fails many of them absolutly do starve, and but for the generosity of America when the people of England evinced little disposition to aid them, many thousands of them long before this would have been starved to death. A few are well enough off to keep a donkey, and with a rude cart to match they are very fond of putting off to town with their wheelbarrow-load of "truck," with the whisky jug to carry back some whisky—the bane of Ireland, but many of these poor people are unable to have a donkey and have to get along without. They are poor indeed. It is a very plain case that there is no God who cares about these poor wretches, or if he does he has an extremely poor way of showing it. Generation after generation he lets them drag along a miserable existence far worse than death, and does not the first thing to help them or alleviate their woes. It seems to me if I was God Almighty for only three weeks I would either do something to help them or kill them off and get them out of their misery. The only thing they seem able to do is to have children; every family has ten or twelve, and what they find to live on to grow up to be men and women no man knoweth. A policeman of the town said to me that they had children just as fast as possible, with half a dozen of the same age and size, so that if one fell into the fire none were big enough to haul him out.

Galway is a very old town, and was originally settled by the Spaniards and Italians who traded at this port centuries ago. The blood so infused still shows, as well as the characteristics of the people, and the great rage of the women for red petticoats and high colors may in this way be accounted for. It seems that the Irish blood has scarcely been improved by the admixture.

We walked over the town for an hour, and the policeman referred to took us down in the lower part of the town occupied by a singular class of people called the Claddagh, a race of hardy fishermen who live in the extreme end of Galway by themselves, their residences being a series of low stone huts, with straw roofs, with no regular streets, and not a donkey or horse or cart among them. There are nearly five thousand of them, and they live distinct from the other residents of Galway, and will not intermarry with them. They follow fishing exclusively, and catch large quantities of fish, many of which are sent even to London. They have their own laws, and manage their own affairs. They are governed by a sort of mayor called the king of Claddagh. This potentate decides all their cases of litigation and contention, and by way of distinction his boat is decorated with a white flag. I did not have the pleasure of seeing the king of Claddagh, but was fortunate enough to see his lieutenant, or the second in command. He is an old, rusty-looking personage, with but little to commend him to the attention of the world. The policeman informed me that these people were very peaceful, and required no attention from the police force; if they sometimes got into a fight and broke each other's heads, they settled it among themselves, or their king settled it for them. He also said that there was but one woman in the five thousand who was a prostitute; she sometimes got drunk and then went over to see the men in the other part of the town, and got into trouble, and they frequently had to lock her up. Among the peculiar customs of this people is that of giving with the bride, as her dowry, a boat, or a share of a boat, according to the means of the parents. The marriage-ring, also, is an heirloom, passing from mother to daughter. It is massive, and often decorated with a heart and crown, supported by two hands. When out fishing they take with them oaten cakes, potatoes, and water, but no ardent spirits of any kind. They make their own boats themselves. I saw one in course of construction, and it appeared a short, stout craft, not more than twenty feet long, and capable of carrying five to ten tons. I saw many also in the water; with these small fishing boats they venture far out into the Atlantic, but it is very seldom that any are drowned or lost. The boats are built upon dry land, and placed in the water by main strength. Twenty men can carry one of the boats; the sails are rude and coarse. Like all other primitive people, they have their lucky and unlucky days; and the people of Galway might starve for the want of fish before they would put out on an unlucky day to catch any for them. On the eve of St. John's day the election of the mayor and sheriffs is made by the Claddagh boys. Their mock ceremony is accompanied by real mirth. Fires are lighted up in various places through the town, round which boys and girls dance in joyous hilarity, armed with long-handled besoms, with which they gently touch such passers-by as refuse to obey the mandate of honor to the bonfire. The attendants of the mayor and sheriffs are also armed with like rude emblems of authority, which in the plenitude of fun are ultimately set on fire, and whirled around over the heads of the noisy population. They have a priest of their own—Catholic of course—and a good school-house for the children.

The policeman pointed out to us what is called Lynch Castle, where three hundred and fifty years ago lived Lynch, the mayor of the town, who showed a degree of severe justice scarcely known among the ancient Romans. It is related that he sent his only son to Spain on some commercial business, who returning with the son of a rich Spanish friend and a valuable cargo of goods, conspired with the crew to murder the Spanish young man, throw him overboard, and convert the cargo to their own uses. One of the party, however, divulged the truth of the matter upon returning home, when the just Mayor Lynch tried his son for the black deed, convicted him, and sentenced him to execution. It was thought by his relatives that through their intercession, and especially as the condemned young man was the mayor's only son, that the father would relent and by some means spare the young man's life. He appointed a certain time for them to call for his answer to their request. Early on the day appointed they called, but found the body of the son hanging from one of the windows of the father's house. Such stern and impartial justice has seldom been known in the world. In thousands of instances men have connived and used every expedient to save the lives of their guilty sons, but this early Irish magistrate flinched not to honor and carry out the behests of the law, though his only son was the victim or subject. He executed his only well-beloved son because he was guilty of a most heinous crime, but we are told of another very just and good being who caused his only well-beloved son to be more cruelly executed, who was entirely innocent, and had committed no offense whatever. I most admire the justice of the stern but just old Irish magistrate.

From Galway we took a southerly course to Limerick, where we arrived late Saturday night, stopping an hour or so just at sunset at the town of Ennis. What the train stopped there an hour for we could not tell, unless, as one of the passengers suggested, it was to let the engine rest, but the time made had not been so rapid as to make a rest seem necessary. We were afforded time, however, to look over this town of 8,000 inhabitants, formerly the residence of the mighty O'Briens, chiefs of Thomond. It has a fine church and a few good buildings, but it is by no means a fine town. The streets are narrow, dirty, and lined on either side with uncomely shops and miserable dwellings, and with an unlimited number of beggars of both ages. A stranger is known at once, and they are sure to "go for him" without the slightest hesitation. "For the love of God give me a penny or two to keep the childer from starving. Do that for the love of the Blessed Virgin, and I will pray for all the good saints to bless ye and give ye long life." Though not regarding their influence with the saints as of any special value to me, I dispensed a few pennies among a few of the most abject, including a blind person or two, but this only seemed to make matters worse, for, like hungry cormorants, they beset me more ferociously, and I was glad to betake myself to the station and into the car. There were unmistakable signs of the immoderate use of whisky. Scores of places had it for sale, many were drunk on the streets, and wretchedness was on all sides. There are fine church edifices in the vicinity, and some old ruins, but there are so much of them in many places that continued mention of them seems superfluous.

We remained at Limerick over Sunday; not because we wished to, but because we were compelled to, as the trains do not run on Sunday. Limerick is situated on the Shannon river, at the head of heavy navigation, some sixty miles from its mouth, and is in the center of a fine productive country. Its date runs back into antiquity, and it is said to have been the home of the kings of Munster in olden times, and many a battle has been fought in its vicinity. The old part of the town was once inclosed by a city wall, but few remains of it now are seen. The old town is now the quarters of the poor; and they are poor indeed. We looked into the places where people live, and they are not so good as Americans often provide for their horses and cattle. They live in cellars and dark, noisome rooms on stone or earth floors, with no furniture, or with the scantiest allowance of the most miserable kind. The little shops where the eatables for the poor are sold are miserable, filthy places, and it would seem that the poor wretches must be very hungry to eat anything obtained there. I passed by many of the dwellings of the lowly, and was fully impressed with the wretchedness which prevails among them. I also got acquainted with a Mr. Michael Casack, a hardware merchant, who is a gentleman of intelligence, and from him I gained much information regarding the condition of the poor. He is a committee man in the charitable work of a city organization, and it was his duty to visit the poor families and see what condition they were in. He said he had often found families of eight or ten persons living in a single room, with not a sign of any furniture save a bed of straw with old rags for a covering, and possibly a cradle, and the stench and filth were often enough to almost overpower him, and he was compelled to use antidotes and disinfectants to prevent the contraction of disease. He also said it was his duty to put them through a course of severe catechism as to their means, where they were born, what their religion was, whether they attended church regularly, whether they led moral lives, etc., etc. If the questions were answered satisfactorily the society gave the sum of one penny per day to each member of a family who had no means of livelihood, and with this pitiful sum they were compelled to buy fuel to keep them warm, and such miserable food as would keep soul and body together. But if they found any taint of immorality, if parents and children were compelled to sleep in the same nest of straw, where the children might be involuntary witnesses of what is considered immoral for children to know anything about, then the penny was withheld, and they were left to live or die as they could make it. There was, however, another society which furnished means with which to purchase other straw and covering, so that half-grown children need not have to sleep in the same bed with their parents, and after this was effected the donation of a penny each was dispensed to those who had thus become moral members of the community.

He told of cases of the most harrowing kind; where the only article of furniture was a cradle, and that contained only straw, on which was an infant sick with a disease of the bowels; the straw was changed once in two or three days, and then used for other members of the family to sleep upon. O God! if there is a God, why does he not do something for such wretchedness? In view of the millions who are thus dragging out a miserable existence far worse than death, how can any person believe that a loving, merciful, and all-powerful being directs the destiny of every human being, and watches with a parental eye over the conditions of all his children?

In the morning I walked down to the docks, which are constructed of hewn stone in a most creditable manner. Vessels, at high tide, drawing twenty-two feet of water can come up to the docks. I saw vessels from various parts of the world, one from Peru with guano, and one just arrived from New York laden with petroleum, making the passage in twenty-three days. After this I attended mass at the Dominican chapel, where the soldiers stationed here get their weekly instalments of religion. Last Sunday I attended church in the old John Knox cathedral, and to-day at the Dominican monks' worshiping place. Thus if I mix up my religion pretty thoroughly it is to be hoped it will not hurt me much. The soldiers marched in order, the officers carrying their heavy swords, and the privates with their bayonets in their belts. As they kneeled while the officiating monk was going through his flummeries before the altar, at one moment kneeling before the image of the Virgin, at another reading in Latin from the missal, and at another holding up a tankard of wine, which the faithful devoutly believe to be the blood of Christ, and then carrying some wafers to the communicants in the front row of kneeling devotees, I said in my heart: "Is this indeed Christianity? Is this indeed religion? And is there an intelligent God who takes pleasure in such foolishness?" The large organ kept up a pretty steady low playing, but no hymn was given out, and no singing done by the audience. Nothing was done by the devotees save to stand upon their knees while the priest performed his stereotyped ceremonies, and then they went off to get drunk and fight, as is their wont upon Sunday afternoons. Some pious old women, and some others not so very old, remained fifteen or twenty minutes, saying Ave Marias and counting their beads, by which they suppose they secure the approbation of the Virgin and obtain a mansion in the blissful regions of paradise. Some images of the Virgin were displayed. A dead Christ, large as life, is up next to the roof, over the altar, with twelve oil paintings on the side of the church, representing Christ in as many different attitudes and positions, carrying his cross from Jerusalem to Calvary, sometimes falling down, sometimes getting up, etc., with numerous doleful-looking saints, who impress one that simon-pure religion has an awful bad effect in crushing out the last particles of cheerfulness and happiness from the human heart.

There are several orders of monks, good brothers, and good sisters located at Limerick, where, with all its wretchedness, thousands upon thousands of dollars have been expended in erecting homes for these useless, pious, lazy idlers. But with all its wretchenness, with all its drunkeness, Limerick is the most Christian, the most Catholic city in Ireland, and with a population of 45,000 it has not a house of prostitution in the city. There is not a city where chastity among the unmarried is more strictly observed. It is, however, a good study for the philosopher to decide, which condition is the best for humanity, a country like France, where the sexual relation among the unmarried is as common as among the married, and abundance and happiness seem to be general, or Ireland, where chastity, drunkenness, religion, and starvation are the rule.

After mass was over we walked to St. Mary's Cathedral, a church of olden time, having been built in the fifteenth century. Here we heard high mass performed, in which there is considerably more chorus and singing. If, however, God delights in the monotonous, drawling, sing-song of the priests, his taste is different from mine. On the strong tower of this cathedral, 120 feet high, a cannon was placed when De Ginkle besieged the city, which did fine execution in shooting down the enemy, and probably proved far more effective than any fulmination the bishop was able to send forth from the pulpit below.

We also took an external and internal view of the old castle, with its seven towers and its massive walls still standing. There is much history connected with it of blood and death which I will not attempt to repeat. It is now used as barracks for soldiers, of which there are quite a number stationed here, as there are in all the principal towns we have visited in Ireland. It must cost a large sum of money to keep the Irish people in a proper state of subjection.

We also visited the celebrated "Treaty Stone" on which the treaty between the forces of William the Third and prominent Irish citizens was signed, one of the conditions of which was that Catholics should be entitled to the fullest liberties and have no embarrassments placed upon them. This provision, however, was violated, and hence Limerick has been called "the city of the violated treaty."

In response to an invitation from Mr. Cusack, we called at his residence and were introduced to his pleasant family and most hospitably entertained. He gave us many facts about the condition of Ireland, and an hour or two passed away very pleasantly.

In the afternoon we took a Sunday excursion train six miles up the Shannon to the Castle Connell, which presents some points of interest and beauty. Parts of the old castle still remain on a rocky mound or eminence, with the rich ivy running profusely over it, as we have seen it in many other localities. Ivy is very natural to Ireland. If our American lovers of house plants could succeed in growing parlor ivy with one-tenth part of the success with which nature does the work here in Ireland they would be proud indeed. The laurel also grows abundantly, as well as the holly, which has a firm, shining leaf, with sharp prickers at the end. I saw many pretty wild flowers, and among them fox-glove (digitalis purpurea), a fine biennial, which in our country is perfected with considerable difficulty, being liable to winter-kill. Here it grows by the sides of ditches, on banks, and even on stone walls, where dirt is also found.

We also went a mile further up the Shannon and saw the "Falls of the Doonass," or, more properly, the rapids of the Shannon. In the course of about half a mile they make a descent of some fifty feet; and as the Shannon is the largest river in Great Britain or Ireland, and at the rapids nearly an eighth of a mile wide, to see it dashing and foaming down among the rocks is a pretty sight indeed, though as a waterfall it is a small affair compared with what we can do in our country. It is perhaps one-tenth the magnitude of the rapids of the St. Lawrence.

Several car-loads of the people of Limerick were out for an excursion, and had the rain only held off we might all have had a pretty nice time of it; but probably that is too much to expect in this country of rain. As we returned it was very plain to be seen that the sons of Erin on the train had been indulging in drink stronger than water, and some of them conducted themselves in a most offensive manner. It was gratifying at the approach of night to get back to Limerick and to part company with the drunken, ill-mannerly roughs.

Monday morning we were off bright and early for Killarney, to take a look at the beautiful lakes and lovely scenery. I will not name the several little villages we passed, but some of them looked very well, and the country is good, showing sufficient evidence of agricultural skill.

At 11 A.M. we arrived at Killarney, and here a more trying ordeal awaited us than had hitherto been our bad fortune. As we stepped from the train about a hundred carriage drivers and their assistants, and half as many hotel drummers and their helpers, were very persistent that we should ride with them or go to their hotel. In fact, there was no getting rid of them. They were not only extremely persistent, but insolent and offensive. They would not take "No" for an answer. Patronize them we must, at any rate. We had been warned somewhat in reference to these pestiferous bores, and advised to go to a hotel and engage their own carriage, boatmen, etc., for a tour of the lakes. We accordingly marched straight forward and made little or no reply to their importunities. A dozen of them would stick into our faces at once the cards or circulars of the hotels for which they were running, and with extreme impudence. At length one of the red-mouthed Mickies sung out, in the broadest Hibernian accent: "Go to hell wid yees. Yees desarve a good kicking to come here to see our lakes and act in that manner."

The beggars were equally numerous and persistent. They acted as though they thought we had come there loaded down with silver for their express benefit, and that it was our duty to hand it to them about as fast as we could get our hands into our pockets. But their game did not work very well. If they got much money out of us we hope it will do them great good.

The population of the town, including some five hundred beggars, amounts to five thousand, and it will be inferred that the larger portion are trying to get their living from the unfortunate sight-seers who call to see the beautiful lakes in this locality. Our hearts, however, being properly hardened, we marched unswervingly forward through the din and hullabaloo to the fine hotel hard by, and signified to the accommodating clerk that we wanted to make a tour of the lakes, and needed an outfit, or the proper carriages and boats for the purpose. He informed us that a jaunting-car to the Glen, and a boat with a pair of oarsmen to row us through the three lakes, and a jaunting-car to return us to the hotel would cost one pound, four shillings (six dollars), and ponies through Glen and luncheon would be seven shillings more each ($1.75). Fortunately a young Englishman and wife were with us, and wished to make the trip; so by making a party of four the expense was $1.50 each, with 25 cents each extra for luncheon to take along with us to eat while passing through the glen. (The luncheon consisted of two thin ham sandwiches, worth about five cents.) We were accordingly soon aboard our jaunting-car and off for the Glen twelve miles away, through a pretty country, well dotted with many comfortable and several fine-looking residences, with the hills which surround the lakes on before us. Here the hedges were neatly trimmed most of the way, indicating that the owners are people of taste. We also saw many beautiful flowers, shrubbery, and a fine growth of deciduous and evergreen trees. These were around and in the vicinity of the better residences.

I have not described to you a jaunting-car, and will now proceed to do so, for they are common in all parts of Ireland, and as an Irish institution particular mention should be made of them. They are a two-wheeled vehicle like a light cart, with a pair of seats at right angles with the axle, the seats some two feet apart, facing outward, with a seat in front for the driver. The seats are sufficient for two persons, though three can squeeze into one of them. Those sitting on the seats ride back to back to each other, the feet hanging outside, and resting on a narrow foot-board, each person looking outward and riding sidewise. It does not seem so social to ride with backs toward those on the opposite seat, as though the seats faced inward, but such is the Irish fashion. There is a bobbing motion in riding, but as the seats are on springs they do not ride unpleasantly, though I much prefer a four-wheeled spring carriage. These jaunting-cars are seen in profusion in every town in Ireland. They cost less than a four-wheeled buggy, which probably accounts for their general use. They also have cabs and covered carriages for rainy weather.

We had traveled about half way to the glen when we met two men on horseback awaiting us, and wishing to hire their "ponies" to us to ride through the glen. They fell in line close in the rear and were very anxious for us to secure their ponies at half a crown each (62 cts.). We replied that we wished no ponies, especially at that time. We soon came to others who also wished to hire ponies, and soon again still more, until as many as ten strong, robust, hearty-looking Irishmen were galloping along close behind us, so that a part of their horses' heads touched our knees, and all most anxious to hire four of us their ten ponies, dilating with Irish eloquence upon their superior qualities as ponies and the long distance through the Glen, it being "four Irish miles—equal to five and a half English miles." The Englishman engaged two of the horses for himself and wife at half a crown each, and then the others were still more persistent to make arrangements with Mr. Bridges and myself. I decided at once that I preferred to walk and should do so. I am not specially fond of horseback riding, and chose to walk even at the same price. Mr. Bridges decided that he would not give half a crown, but would give a shilling (25 cents).

"O yer honor, that is quite too little for a fine pony to ride four Irish miles, equal to five and a half English miles. Shure and its yourself that will give more than that."

"No," said Mr. Bridges, "I will only give a shilling."

"O yer honor, sir. I cannot take so little, but shure I'll be afther splitting the difference wid ye. Ye may have this illegant pony for two shillings, but not for any less."

"No, I will only give you a shilling."

"And shure yer honor will be more generous than that."

And so the chaffering went on, mile after mile, the ten horsemen following closely after us, as though their very existence depended upon their hiring us their horses. The driver of our jaunting car tried to drive away from them, but it was of no use; the persistent horsemen kept closely up to us, and as I was occupying the back seat I got the benebenefit of the horses' noses. Our driver finally got mad and cursed the valorous Irish brigade so closely pursuing us, and told them they ought to be ashamed of themselves, that we had given our answers, and that ought to be enough, and they ought to turn back and annoy us no longer. He also talked to them vociferously in Irish, with which I am not sufficiently acquainted to be able to translate, but all this was of no avail; the Irish cavalry still pursued us, and were still clamorous that we should hire their ponies. The scene was a novel one, and filled me with mirth. I often looked back and viewed the anxious pursuing legion and laughed outright. It exceeded anything I had seen in the line.

As we approached the Glen they became still more clamorous, all the more anxious to secure the hiring of their ponies. A new feature was also added to the scene to make up a variety. Two quite mature maidens darted out of a small hut and pursued us on the run, regardless of the carwheels or the pursuing cavalry. They each carried two bottles and a small glass or tumbler. One bottle contained goat's milk, and the other "mountain dew," or whisky. They were bare-footed, bare-legged, and bare-headed, and were at least good runners, for they kept along with us for fully half a mile. To patronize them a little I took a glass of goat's milk of one, Eily O'Connor, and as the other claimed to be the real and original "Colleen Bawn," and had photographs of herself to sell, I was constrained to give her sixpence (twelve cents) for one of them, so when I get home those of you who wish to see how the Colleen Bawn looks in her native dress can be accommodated.

At length we arrived at the point where the jaunting-cars are left and where the horseback riding or walking commences. The maid who had sold me the goat's milk had followed and importuned me to try some of the "mountain dew" before attempting the passage of the glen. My virtue was so great that I firmly refused, assuring her I could make the passage quite as well without the dew as with it. I then upbraided her with cheating me in the milk, calling it goat's milk when it was only cow's milk.

"Och!" said she, "it is goat's milk, for shure, yer honor."

"But, Biddy, show me the goats. I see cows about here, but no goats. Please show me the goats."

"Faith, sor, the goats are on the mountain. If you will go up there with me I will show them to you. Faith, and I will."

Not having the time or inclination to climb the the mountain with her I was forced to take her word as to the matter of the goats, and to this day I am not able to say with certainty whether it was goat's milk or cow's milk that I drank; but at all events it did not hurt me "at all at all."

At this juncture our sandwiches were dispensed to us by the driver of the jaunting-car, and I took mine in my hand and walked out, eating it the while, to avoid the importunities of the pony fellows. One of them had accepted Mr. Bridges's offer of a shilling, and he had mounted, and two of them stuck to me to take theirs at the same price. I said:

"No, I have told you repeatedly I prefer to walk. I do not want your pony. Can you not understand me? When you visit my country I will not annoy you this way, but will let you ride or walk as you please. Why cannot you do the same by me? Please turn back and let me have peace."

At that one of them turned back, but the other still followed with:

"Yer honor, ye will find it a very long way to walk, an' ye'll wish for the pony before ye get half-way through. I offer the pony to yees very chape, and I know ye'll want him."

I had become wearied with his persistence, and turning upon him with more than my usual emphasis, said, "Now you may go to ——!" The place I mentioned is said to be a very warm country, more known by the preachers than anybody else, the revised name for which I believe is hades. "Go where you please, so you let me alone." He turned and went somewhere; perhaps it was hades. He might not have gone far to reach the place designated. I pressed on, munching my sandwich, and feeling a great sense of relief.

The Glen, as the name implies, is a gap, gorge, or passage through the mountain rocks, which are piled up some hundreds of feet on either side, not perpendicularly, but with a gradual slant. In several places are remarkable echoes, which were tested as we passed along by playing on a bugle and firing off a small cannon. The echoes and reverberations from wall to wall were excellent—as good as I ever heard. Near the entrance of the Glen is a small, narrow, irregular sheet of water, called Serpent Lake, and said to be the last place where the snakes lingered when St. Patrick banished them from Ireland. Presuming that the snake-banishing myth is just about as true as the fable of which it is a part, I passed on.

The views of the dark, towering, frowning rocks on either side as we passed along were really grand. Now and then the winding passage is wider than elsewhere, and a little patch of land now and then appears, with a stone hut, a family living in it, a plenty of little children playing around the door, and a few cattle and sheep feeding on the plat of grass.

Soon after reaching the summit and half-way point I met a small company of bare-headed, bare-footed, and bare-legged damsels, their apparent ages ranging from twelve to forty, some with bottles of goat's milk and mountain dew, and some with coarse heavy stockings, all of which they were especially anxious to sell for silver and even copper money. They were sitting on a ledge of the rocks as I approached them, and feeling sociably inclined I accosted them in this manner:

"I presume you are the fairies of the Glen."

"Yes, thanks, yer honor, and we want to sell ye a leetle goat's milk and a drop of mountain dew to cheer yer heart in yer long walk."

"I see you are more real than many of the fairies I have read of, but I don't think I wish to buy anything. I am a disciple of Father Matther and do not believe in mountain dew, and as to the goat's milk, I had some back at the entrance of the Glen, and I am not sure it was the genuine goat's milk either. I am afraid you fairies are disposed to cheat us poor wayfarers who come to view the beauties of your country."

"Bless yer sowl! yer honor, sir-r, this is the raal goat's milk, and no mistake. We would not chate ye for the wurruld."

"But where are the goats? I have not seen a goat since I left Killarney. Produce the goats."

"Oh! the goats, yer honor, are on the mountain feeding. If ye will go up there ye will see a plinty of thim, and shure ye will."

"Well, I guess I will let them remain up there and take your word for it, but I don't want any milk just now."

A little rosy-cheeked girl approached me with a pair of coarse white stockings and said:

"Please, sir, buy these stockings of me."

"What is the price of them, my little fairy?"

"One and sixpence, sir-r."

"That is cheap enough, and they are very good for the kind, but they are heavier and coarser than I am in the habit of wearing; besides I have a plenty of stockings and have not room to carry any more. You see I have set out on a long journey, and it stands me in hand to carry no more than I require. I do not need these stockings, and I must not take them."

"Yes sir-r, yer honor, but they will keep you warm in cold weather."

"Yes, I know they will; but you see I am going where the weather is not very cold, and what I have will answer all purposes. My little wife bought me some very nice stockings before I left home, and they are all I require. But, my little fairy, may I ask your name?"

"Katy O'Sullivan, sir-r."

"That is a nice name. I am fond of the name of Katy. And what is your age?"

"Twelve years old, sir-r, and going on thirteen."

"That is a good age, too. You will soon be a fine young lady. I am sorry that the stockings are so thick and heavy, for I would like to buy them of you. Had you known that I was coming, and that I preferred light stockings, I am sure you would have knit me a lighter pair, would you not?"

"Yes sir-r. But won't you buy these of me, sir?"

"I don't see how I can. I have no room for them. But I'll tell you what I can buy of you, Katy, and take with me just as well as not; that is a kiss. I could carry several of them; yes, half a dozen."

"But sir-r-r" (blushing), "I do not sell kisses."

"I will not insist upon your selling them. I will take them as a present. Do you not know that I would esteem them highly? And then, I might make you a present in return."

"Yes sir-r, but I do not give kisses away."

"But you might in this case. I have not had a kiss since I came into Ireland. Just think how far I have come, and not a kiss have I had since I left America. Do you never do any kissing in this country? Do your mother and the priest tell you that it is wrong to kiss?"

At this Mary O'Sullivan, who had told me her name, a cousin of Katy's, and thirty years of age, answered the question:

"It will not do for us to kiss strangers."

"Well, you need not consider me much of a stranger. I am easy to get acquainted with, and I feel as if I knew you pretty well already. Can you not be as good to me as if my name was Pat or Mike? The little girls in our country sometimes kiss, and I have even heard it said that larger ones sometimes do it, and I guess it don't hurt them."

"Oh, what a plizent gintleman ye are, sir-r, to be shure! I am shure so plizent a gintleman has not come through this Glen in many a day."

"I am afraid you are given to flattery, Mary, and perhaps you have kissed the blarney stone, though you will not kiss me. You must remember I am an old man, and that it is hardly worth while to flatter me."

"Ye are not old at all, sir-r."

"Oh, yes, I am; I am away past sixty. Before this year closes it will see me sixty-three."

"And shure yer not a day over forty, and I tell ye a plizenter gintleman has not come through this glen and walked off as brisk as yersel, sir-r."

"More flattery, Mary; I am now almost sure you have kissed the blarney stone. But what is the use of a man being old before he needs to be? I think it best for all ages to be lively and cheerful."

"Yes, yer honor, it is far the best way; and I am shure there is none more plizent than yersel. And now take a little of this mountain dew; it will cheer yer heart and make ye plizent and happy intirely."

"No, thank you, Mary. I do not need any mountain dew. I do not believe in it. I am a disciple of Father Matther and think that mountain dew does a great deal of harm. But how is it, Mary, that you do not get married?"

"Oh, the right man has not come along yet. You did not come along yourself till to-day."

"No, but I am an old man, past the time for marrying; besides I have a wife already, and it would not do for me to marry any more."

"Ye are young enough if ye had no wife. Ye are so plizent. Ye would suit the girls in the Black Valley well enough, yer honor."

"Mary, you flatter too much. You should be careful of my feelings. You don't know how tender they are. But if I was younger, if I had no wife, however much I might be inclined to you girls of the Black Valley, I should almost be afraid to marry any of you because you Irish women have so many children."

"Ha, ha, ha! Good for ye, yer honor! Ye are such a plizent gintleman, ye are. The childer, ye say. The more the merrier! Twenty is the rule, ha! ha! ha!"

"That is all very nice to talk about, Mary, but just think of it for a moment, a woman to have twenty children! Oh, I should be afraid of such a woman, Mary. But how is it that you Irish women have so many children? Upon my soul I believe Ireland would be able to people the world if all the other inhabitants were swept off the earth. How do you account for this, Mary?"

"I think it is the goat's milk, the mountain dew, and the petaties, yer honor."

"Well, perhaps it is, but I must confess it is all a mystery to me. But why don't a lot of you girls go to America? There are some millions of your people there already, and we might as well have a few more. There is plenty of work to be done there, and pretty good pay given for it."

"Yes, yer honor, that is jist what we are after wishing to do. We are saving up all we can to go to America next year; and cannot you give us a little siller to help us?"

"Unfortunately I am not prepared to enter into the emigration enterprise to any large extent, but America is your country. But tell me where you all live now?"

"Up in yonder Black Valley which goes out from the Glen before you."

"And what do you find to do, and how can you make any money in such a place as this?"

"Oh, we knit and sew and take care of the childer and sell goat's milk and mountain dew to those who, like yourself, come through the glen to see the lakes. And now, sir-r, yer honor, please buy some of me. We Irish girls will talk and say anything that is lively and plizent, but we will do nothing that is wrong. A true Irish girl will not step aside to do that which is not right."

"Yes, I understand that, and for that the Irish girls deserve great honor. But there are other things you ought to do. You should discourage the use of mountain dew. It is a curse to your country and your people, and you ought not to sell it or persuade any one to drink it."

"But, yer honor, a wee drop will not hurt any one, and it is good to cheer up the heart and make life pass away smooth and plizent."

"Ah, Mary, that is all wrong. It does not make life pass smooth and pleasant, but makes poverty and wretchedness. If the money spent in Ireland for mountain dew could be applied to making your homes pleasant and comfortable, and in providing the necessaries of life, far, far better would it be for the people of this country."

"True for ye, sir-r. Ye spake the truth, and ye is a plizent gintleman entirely."

And so the fairies of the Glen and myself chatted on as they accompanied me for some two miles, two or three on each side of me, and others close behind, walking over the rough and often sharp stones with their bare feet as though the stones were the softest carpets. I inquired if the stones did not hurt their feet, and they answered, "Oh, no, not at all;" they were "used to it, and had to be used to it."

Two or three times I asked if they were not going too far, and if they had not better return. They answered, "Oh, no, we will go with you as far as we can. 'Tis not every day we have such a plizent gintleman to walk with as yoursel."

I assured them they complimented me quite too highly, and that I knew lots of gentlemen far more pleasant than myself.

"Then will ye not please to send them over to see the lakes and us girls of the Black Valley?"

"Perhaps I can induce some of them to come. I can, at all events, tell them how kindly you have accompanied me to-day."

"Then plaze do that same, yer honer. And when will you come again yoursel?"

"Well, I cannot give you much encouragement of coming soon. However strong my inclination may be to come again and see you fairies of the Glen, I have a long journey to perform, and I fear other duties will prevent my returning soon."

"Well, yer honer, we will pray to all the blessed saints to send ye safe on yer journey and to bring ye back here again. Ye are a plizent gintleman entirely."

I proposed that our next meeting be in America, where it would be more convenient for me to see them, and where they could probably find better employment than selling mountain dew. To this they readily assented; but they urged me repeatedly to leave a little silver with them to help them make the journey and to remember me by. I assured them that with great pleasure would I comply with their wishes did not the exigencies of the case seem to forbid; that I was on a journey that would last nearly a year, and that every day, and at every turn I made, I had to pay out money, and that therefore they would have to excuse the munificent presents my nature would otherwise prompt me to make. They insisted with pertinacity that I should at least give them something to remember me by.

At the gate where I entered the possessions of a rich man, through which I had to pass to reach the lake, an adieu had to be taken of the fairies. I consented that Mary O'Sullivan might pour me a glass of goat's milk, and at her urgent request I suffered her to add "a wee drap of the mountain dew." I agreed with her that the least drop in the world would not hurt me. And then I turned and took my leave of Bridget McGinnis, Annie O'Flaherty, Mary O'Shaunnessy, Biddy O'Rourke, Ann Gallagher, Mary O'Sullivan, Katy O'Sullivan, and all the rest of them. I told Katy I should have left with a lighter and happier heart had she given me something to remember her by, but I would only have the memory of her want of generosity. She hung her head and looked a little sorry, and as though she relented a little; but then it was too late. Very pretty "Good-byes" and "God bless yees" came from all of them; and in counting up the expenses I found it had cost me twice as much to walk with the fairies as it did Mr. Bridges to ride the pony. But "sich is life."

It cost a shilling each to walk an eighth of a mile through the rich man's posessions to the upper end of the lakes, where we found two boatmen awaiting us with sprightly-looking craft for us to ride in a distance of twelve miles through the three lakes.

The charming lakes of Killarney have been so often described by poets, painters, and fine writers that it seems a useless effort for me to undertake it, so I will only say the lakes are narrow, irregular sheets of water surrounded on each side with high, picturesque, and very attractive hills or piles of rocks covered with green moss, with here and there diminutive bushes and trees, all very green, and with numerous small islands all along as we passed down. Some of the hills are in continuous ranges, but they

Black and Ingersoll.

It is certainly a sign of the times, and a very gratifying one to every advocate of free discussion, when the editor of so respectable a review as the North American considers that an examination, pro and con, of the merits of Christianity, by two such able men as Col. Ingersoll and Judge Black, would be interesting to its readers. The universal consciousness of the fact that man is mortal, the general belief in a continued existence after death, and the question whether we shall be happy or miserable in a future state, always has invested and always will invest the subject of religion with deep interest to all reflecting men.

The nineteenth century, with its freedom of thought, is beginning to feel that its childlike credulity has been imposed upon by its predecessors; and as neither Catholics nor Protestants hav now the legal power to send doubters to prison or the stake, men everywhere, in Europe and America, are beginning to apply the rules of evidence and the demonstrations of science in examining the claims of the church and her various creeds.

In this work of fearless examination, so that the common people, who hav suffered the most from superstition, can understand the subject, no man now living is to be compared to Col. Ingersoll. Religiously educated, and understanding perfectly the Christian doctrins and the history of their acknowledged spokesman and exponent, the church; conscious of his great powers of wit and ridicule; deeply penetrated with the conviction that all church claims are utterly without foundation, and that their enforcement in past ages through the ignorance and credulity of its victims has greatly hindered the civilization of mankind; as well skilled in the use of the scalpel as ever Voltaire was, he seems to take infinit pleasure in vivisecting the church and clergy before an appreciativ audience and seeing them writhe in speechless agony. He seems to practice this cruelty with the same sang froid that a thoughtless boy evinces when he transfixes a poor fly on the window pane with a pin and sees the helpless sufferer constantly striving to escape from its persecutor, and constantly failing. Since the Colonel is known to hav a kind and sympathizing heart toward all persons in distress, and to be above reproach in regard to his morals, his unrelenting ferocity against the popular religion and its professional, bigoted teachers can only be attributed to his poignant conviction that it is a false and cruel system, and a mountainous hindrance to the progress of the human family in intelligence and happiness.

The universal dumbness of the clergy under the Colonel's assaults results from the fact that, as a general rule, with many exceptions, they are extremely ignorant upon the questions at issue, and therefore entirely unprepared to reply to the modern arguments against their religion. They were sent to the theological seminaries years ago, not as students of the great subject of religion as a department in the science of anthropology, but merely to prepare to preach the gospel and save souls. When, therefore, a scientist uses the modern discovery of the conservation of force as an argument against the doctrin of miracles, or the truth of evolution as proof against the fundamental doctrin of the fall of man, the clergyman is at his wits' end, and is compelled to sing dumb.

The spirit of Freethought and investigation seems to be everywhere except among the clergy. It is in the very atmosphere. Our literature is permeated by it. The press everywhere, except those papers which circulate among the pagani, the people who liv in obscure sections of the country—drop, intentionally or otherwise, many seeds of philosophical and scientific truth, which fall into good ground and produce their effect upon the people. The railroad cars, as well as the bookstores, sell Ingersoll's lectures by the thousand; and no man who has intelligence enough to read and comprehend one of them can ever afterward be the same person he was before in his feelings toward the church and its claims.

There are many superstitious dogmas which hav been for ages and still are paraded in the pulpit, like a Philistine Goliath, to scare the people into a blind and unquestioning faith and to keep them quiet and submissiv in the church. But when Ingersoll, with his sling and stone, smites it in the forehead, it never recovers, but dies, and soon calls aloud for burial. Of the men who live, or hav lived, he best knows the vital spot in a theological error and how to giv it the death-blow. No wonder the Rev. Dr. Newman wishes to stop his mouth by due process of law. To his influence in this line we must ascribe the fact, mourned over so generally by all sects of the church, that the baptized youth of the country hav to so great an extent lost their interest in the ministrations of the pulpit. The Young Men's Christian Associations hav been gotten up to supply the failure of the clergy to attract young men to the churches, but these, although bolstered up with money and prestige, are failures too.

In the Colonel's article in the North American Review he lays aside the scalpel, which serves him such a good purpose on the platform, and makes his attack upon the popular religion in the shape of a bill of indictment, with specifications carefully drawn up. He defines what Christianity is, and then undertakes to prove that it is not worthy of credence. He makes the charge that the Bible justifies the barbarous institution of slavery; allowed polygamy; authorized and enjoined religious persecution for opinion's sake, and in the New Testament itself bases salvation from eternal hell fire on belief, when, in intellectual economy, it is plain that a man's belief is governed by the amount of evidence he sees, and is a matter over which he has no control and for which he is not accountable. These ideas, and many others which are correlativ to them, he enforces fairly, calmly, but with tremendous energy.

It reflects great discredit on the clergy that, although they number several scores of thousands in this country, among whom are many eminent doctors of divinity, not one of them of any note, from Dan even unto Beersheba, has ever had the courage to meet Col. Ingersoll in debate, either oral or written. Itinerant laymen offer their services to the church, and go up and down trying to "pulverize" the arguments which the Colonel wields with such tremendous power; but they don't seem to be highly appreciated by the people, and they generally retire in disgust. The watchmen upon Zion's walls see the Colonel traveling all over the country, and the people flocking in thousands to hear him speak, and paying large money for the privilege; and although they profess to be the successors of the confessors and martyrs of old, and the sworn defenders of the faith, they carefully avoid grappling with the arch heretic, and satisfy their consciences by uttering imbecil tirades against him from their pulpits on Sunday.

The only man of mark in all the country who has shown himself willing to enter the lists is Judge Black, a layman, who is not even a member of the church in full communion, but seems to belong to that class we read of in the Old Testament, who "feared the Lord but served their own gods." He begins his defense of the church and its religion against Ingersoll's attack by saying that such defense is no business of the priests, but that their prescribed duty is to preach the gospel, leaving such as he, "an unlearned and unauthorized layman," simply to act the part of a policeman to silence the Colonel as a rude disturber of the Lord's congregation of saints. No doubt this dictatorial assignment and limitation of the clergyman's function is very grateful to the common run of mercenary priests in all denominations, who, like Micah of old, say, "Put me, I pray thee, into the priest's office, that I may hav a piece of bread," and who, in consideration of what they receive, feed the Lord's hungry people every Sunday with a mild infusion of milk and water. But how will the really able men in the ministry, who, in their ordination vows, swore not only that they would preach the gospel, but that they would defend its doctrins against all gainsayers, no matter what persecution might arise to them on that account—how will they like the ex-cathedra, bishop-like style in which the Judge points out their humble duties? It is doubtful whether this large and respectable class of ministers will thank the Judge for taking away their high character as defenders of the faith, and converting them into inane pulpiteers like Moody and the rest of the evangelists, who flourish most where the people are the most weak-minded and ignorant.

Judge Black givs a glowing account of the strength and prosperity of the church, but if he would read the church papers themselvs, and examin the statistics they publish, he would see, as has already been intimated, that all the Protestant denominations confess and mourn over their decreasing strength, and that the Catholics alone are increasing in proportion to the population of the country. Comparativly few young men offer themselvs for the ministry, and what few there are are far from being men of first-rate ability. There are no such accessions of new converts to the church as there were formerly, and the church owes its strength chiefly to the completeness of its organization, its wealth, and its old prestige.

The Judge has a national reputation as a jurist, and as a Pennsylvanian I am proud of his record as the chief justice of our supreme court, and a worthy successor to Judge Gibson. But he is a mere lawyer, and belongs to that class of the legal fraternity who are men of precedent, and never ask a question back of custom and the law. Bacon, in his "Advancement of Learning," speaks of this class as knowing well enough what is the law, but not what ought to be the law. Hence, as a general rule, they are not safe statesmen and legislators. Hence, also, so few, comparativly, ever distinguish themselvs as agitators and reformers of abuses sanctified by age. They look not into the seeds of things to see what will grow out of them, but rummage among the authorities of antiquity to find out what is the law. It is this slavish respect for precedent that made Judge Black, during the thirty years' antislavery agitation, and continues to make him an unchangeable proslavery man. While a regenerated South, with the scales of ignorance and prejudice fallen from her eyes, thanks God every day for the unspeakable blessing disguised in Lincoln's proclamation of freedom to the slave, Judge Black, true to his old instincts, speaks mournfully of the event, and still harps on the old string that the morals of the country were injured by the discussion and abolition of slavery. Was not Abraham, the father of the faithful, a slave-holder? Was not Washington a slave-holder? Did not the inspired Paul direct Philemon to return Onesimus, a fugitiv slave, to his master? and did he not enjoin all other slaves to be obedient to their masters? Was not slavery a legal institution in this country, and did it not exist under the Federal Constitution?

Most of the educated and philosophic men of this day, exercising faith in God as the father of all his children, and in the great law of progress and development which has brought mankind up to its present condition, direct their eyes in hope to the future, when all men shall hav a fairer chance than they now hav in the struggle for property and happiness. But Judge Black, like all other born and predestinated Bourbons, has his eyes in the hinder part of his head, and sees and admires nothing but the past. He carries the habit of the lawyer into the arena of theological discussion, and instead of being calm and fair, as a seeker after truth should be, storms and scolds, as he would an adversary in a criminal case before a county court and jury. The spirit of the nineteenth century has arraigned the church in the Court of the Human Understanding, to show cause, if she can, why the people should not repudiate her creeds as false and her authority as usurped, and require her to convert her meeting-houses into scientific lecture rooms. The fact that so many good people believed, and still believe, in her system of religion, makes it proper that the questions at issue shall be decided judicially, reason and conscience alone being judges in the case. Dogmatism and personal discourtesy are entirely out of place, and it is because Judge Black has been guilty of these faults and played the part of a bulldozing, county-court lawyer that many a judicious and fair-minded clergyman will secretly say in his soul, if not with his lips, Non tali auxilio; nec defensoribus istis.

It would be impossible, in the short space allowed in a daily newspaper, to follow Judge Black through his whole article and point out his failure to meet Col. Ingersoll's facts and arguments. Besides, it would be a work of supererogation, for every intelligent and candid man must feel that he has injured both himself and his cause by his characteristic method of debate.

There is, however, one charge that he makes against the Colonel that cannot be passed over without comment, because, while it is used merely ad captandum, and is well calculated to receive the applause of his clients, the clergy, it has the appearance of considerable force until it is examined. The Judge alleges that in disavowing belief in the Jewish God and rejecting the Bible as an infallible relation of his will, the Colonel's morals must be in a state of confusion, because he has "no acknowledged standard of right and wrong." Because the radicals repudiate the anthropomorphic idea of God believed by the church; that he is a person, which means that he is an infinitly great man, with eyes to see, ears to hear, with a nose to smell and enjoy the odor of burnt-offerings, and with all the other parts and functions of a man, they hav no supreme intelligence to adore and obey, and no rule to judge of the right and wrong of human actions. The Judge holds the medieval idea incorporated into the creeds of Christendom, that justice between man and man is obligatory because it is the will of God, who has spoken to the world in the laws he enacted for his chosen people, the Jews. But as to the Decalog, the first, fourth and fifth precepts contain internal evidence that the law was local in its application, and except in those parts purely moral, designed for the Jewish people alone. As to the law bearing upon a change of religious opinion, contained in the 13th chapter of Deuteronomy, no one not besotted by superstition can read it without horror. It was this law which impelled the Jews of the 17th century to persecute and denounce their co-religionist, Spinoza, when science aided him in emerging from those infantil conceptions of the great God handed down by the laws and traditions of his race. It was the spirit of this law which drove both the Catholic and Protestant churches respectivly to persecute, not maliciously, but on principle, all those who repudiated their creeds and their spiritual authority. If we could injure God by blaspheming against his name, the most audacious blasphemy we could utter against the universal father would be to say that he wrote as a law this 13th chapter of Deuteronomy when he knew beforehand what bloody use it would be to put to in the future ages of the church. The same code authorized the Jews to make property and merchandise of the heathen round about; and for ages this has been the warrant for the intelligent and strong to oppress the ignorant and the weak. But it was the law, and, therefore, Judge Black, in his regard for precedent, was opposed to giving 4,000,000 of the American people who had been slaves the common rights of humanity, and was willing, on the legal principle of partus sequitur ventrom, to doom them to everlasting bondage.

The philosopher, however, who seeks by knowledge to understand man's relation to the universe, rejects with scorn the ferocious and arbitrary laws enacted by the Jewish God, and adopts this as his standard of morals: that a given thing is a duty and ought to be done, not because it is enjoined in the Bible, the Koran, or the Zend-Avesta; not because we shall play on the golden harps, and walk the golden streets of the New Jerusalem if we do, and wail in the eternal flames of hell fire if we do not, but because it is eternally and everywhere right and proper in itself considered. The intelligent radical is a just man in all the relations of life, whether there is a God or not, and whether there is a future state of being or not. For every act of justice or mercy he performs he gets his reward in the doing of it, by the approbation of his own conscience and the promotion of his own self-respect. As a free, just, and accountable agent, he believes that no man has a right to do anything which injures either himself or any other person. But as he owes duties first and foremost to himself, he has a right, as he journeys through life in his triple character of a being endowed with an intellect which delights in knowledge, affections which seek their proper objects in love, and a body with its various needs, to enjoy anything and everything which does not injure himself or others. This is the radical standard of morals. It is so short, so easily comprehended, and so obviously just and reasonable that it does not require a priest to expound it. Besides this, it never varies, but is the same in all ages and countries. The Bible standard of morals changes according to time and circumstances. It authorized slavery, religious persecution, and polygamy, all of which are considered crimes in our day. By the law of natural morality, however, slavery and religious persecution were always wrong, because they injured not only the victim, but him who inflicted the wrong. And polygamy is wrong because it violates the natural law, apparent in all census tables, that whereas the sexes are equally balanced in point of numbers, nature wills and provides a wife for every man and a husband for every woman.

Some men, unfortunately for themselvs, are born before their time, and hav to keep in advance of their age, and be forever unpopular. But Judge Black, as a theologian and moralist, was born after his time. He should hav flourished in those ages when authority and precedent ruled over a subject world, and before science and Freethought, like the sun in the east, had dawned upon the darkness. He is out of place in the closing decades of the nineteenth century, when the insatiable hungering of the human soul after truth in all the departments of inquiry, and a supreme reverence for it when found, establish man's title to be the very child of God. The daring and iconoclastic spirit of radicalism does not aim recklessly to destroy. It is constructiv also, and shows itself to be such by substituting for the church standard of morals, which has licensed every crime, one which is founded on utility, and is entirely safe for society, because it is natural and invariable. The radicals, in giving up the Jewish and Christian notions of a personal God and his laws, embodied in the so-called "Mosaic" writings, are not, as Judge Black intimates, like a ship at sea without compass or rudder. Taken as a class, with very few exceptions, their lives prove that this is not the case. They hav a safe anchorage. Their rule of morals appeals for its authority to the noblest instincts of human nature, and especially to the sense of justice; more or less developed in all mankind by the progress of civilization; whereas the church rule applies to the basest and most despicable passion of the human soul—its fears. Unsatisfied.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:—In the discussion between Mr. Mair and Mr. Bennett it is evident that all the talent, all the history, and all the craft and ingenuity that Mr. Mair was possessed of was exhausted in attempting to prove by whom and when his Christian Bible was written, and failing to do that, we are left as much in ignorance of what he asserted to be true as we were before he commenced to explain it. He avoided the natural causes that always hav and always will produce the same effect. His whole argument, as logical as he thought it, was a waste of words. Not so with Mr. Bennett; he showed clearly what Mr. Mair did not know. It is not possible Mr. Mair would be satisfied for his children to know nothing more than what they could learn from the Bible, although he asserts it to be the greatest and best book ever written, containing all that is necessary to know of truth, Christianity, religion, and morality. Would he wish them to know nothing more, and to be deprived of all instruction in astronomy, zoology, geology, archæology, and the different branches of scientific knowledge not to be found in any of the many Bibles? To hav a knowledge of nature's laws, and believing in their truths, would hav a tendency to shake their belief in the old superstitions, dogmas, and doctrins of ancient times; and if they become students of the seven great branches of the knowledge of man, Mr. Mair would brand them with the sobriquet of Infidel, skeptic, or Atheist. What Liberals Should Do.—Some Moral Philosophy.

ABSTRACT OF AN ADDRESS AT HORNELLSVILLE, N. Y., BY REUBEN DAILEY.

Mr. Dailey having prefaced his speech by a reference to the fact that there are no Christians living to this day, and having expressed the hope that all Liberals' skepticism is born of honest doubt, proceeded to speak of the duties of Liberals, and said: Consider this fact that we assume to be guides and teachers of the world, we are proud of the idea that we are progressiv men, and there can be no such thing as progress unless it is by the advancement of our individual selvs. The best evidence we can giv of our capacity to benefit the world is to show in our own life an example of honor, manliness, industry, and sobriety. We must keep our ideas clear on all points of progress; we must be sure of every step. Recollect that science does not necessarily involve morals, but the science of a good life does. Our aim should be manly perfection as far as possible. Perfection is the proper appliance of all faculties. For illustration, a man may be much interested in the study of phrenology, he may become an adept in the knowledge of the bumps, yet in the matter of personal industry as a means of earning money to pay his way he may be wofully deficient. He may possess a critical knowledge of the theory of evolution and yet be an unfaithful man in his family relation. So a man may be authority in ancient history, in languages, and the exact sciences, yet he may lack true politeness, courtesy, and agreeable manners. The aim should be that while we pursue these reforms we should at the same time be careful to add loveable, agreeable, and upright personal characteristics. In the ardor of our battle against these great wrongs we are apt to forget our own faults. We forget that it is most important that our own life be a vindication of our sentiments. Then, my friends, loving the cause of Liberalism as I do, desiring to see it prosper, desiring to witness the freest toleration of diverse opinion, permit me, as a young Liberal, to modestly suggest the following:

1. Be moral men and women. Now what does that include? Much indeed; everything. If we are moral we will do no wrong. We can be guilty of no dishonest act toward individuals or government. Honesty includes industry, because every man owes to the world a return for that which he used in the maintenance of his life, as also it includes a willingness to pay a fair price for a fair article at all times.

2. I would recommend that each Liberal take an interest in the charities and philanthropies of the day and manifest a willingness to bear equally the burden of the support of the unfortunate and deserving poor, as the widow, the orphan, crippled, and blind.

3. I would recommend that each Liberal show a neighborly disposition at all times, giving a practical recognition of our foundation principle that all men are created free and equal.

4. I would recommend kindness to those whom the world recognizes as our inferiors financially and socially.

5. I would recommend courtesy to all, kindness to the unfortunate, and a general conduct in life that inspires the lowly to approach us in confidence of kind treatment.

6. I would recommend that each Liberal man and woman try to keep order in their house and perform the functions of ruler of the home with quietness, kindness, moderation, and wisdom; to study the comfort of home and keep it clean, in good repair, and orderly.

7. I would recommend attention to personal appearances. We should be elegant if we can, but never fail to be clean and decent. Above all, our children should giv constant evidence of attention to their personal comfort and neatness of attire.

8. We should maintain always business relations of the best kind. Honesty in business is as essential to success as chastity is to the character of woman. The calling by which we earn bread and clothes for ourselvs, wife, and children should receive our individual energies. Business first, hobbies afterward. Execute every order for business with all possible promptness and unscrupulous honesty of detail at that.

9. On matters of public interest assume and maintain that position which is for the general public good. Everything is policy in this life, but that which in the course of human events proves to be best is the only true policy. Temporary expedients should not be resorted to; patchwork is always a waste of time.

10. Beware of abnormal development of your faculties or tendencies, either for drink, animal gratification, or gambling. This is the trinity of the world's devil, which, if it put its combined force on any man, will soon reduce him far below the level of the brute. If you suffer either of these to run away with you your Liberalism will avail you nothing.

Finally, make a study of life and determin for yourself that you will extract from it the most happiness possible in the brief span of time which nature has alloted to you as a lifetime. And, then, I think by the observation of these rules nobody will be able to say that Liberalism has been an injury to to you, but rather a benefit. It is a most important matter for the world that superstition be smashed, but it is far more important to yourself that this life should be happy, and that in your own home there should be happiness; and if you hav it there it will be the best evidence that the principles which you believe and practice are calculated to be of benefit to the world.

All human actions should be considered in their relations to and effects upon our fellow-men. The only true test of the goodness or badness of an action is the questions, What effect will it hav on myself? What effect on my family, my neighbor, my fellow-citizen, and the country at large? Determin surely in your own mind if it will injure any of these. If it will not destroy health, if it will not unnecessarily waste property without any adequate return; if it will not mar the happiness of your family, render uncomfortable your neighbor, defame the name or disturb the good feelings of your fellow-citizens, defraud the government, then you may lawfully do that act. If it givs you pleasure you should do it. This theory of morality, you will perceive, disregards the theory of God. The idea of deity is a blank, because we cannot injure omnipotence, neither can we make the mysterious fiction of theological dream happy by a good act. We must act only upon the basis of clearly acquired truths and visible bodies. Then we will act at all times intelligently, and the superior advantage we will hav over orthodoxy will be the entire absence of a fear all the time that by personal gratifications we are offending an unknown and infinit being. Obtain this intelligent and definit basis of moral action, then the mind becomes clear and placid. It is not harassed by doubts nor tortured by the fear of infinit possibilities of punishments that may grow out of actions which are but the answer to nature's impulses.

There is no logical connection between a theological opinion and a moral act. Opinions on trinity or unity of God, or a belief in the immaculate conception, the Mosaic cosmogony in biblical history, cannot make a man good or bad unless he finds in the acts of the Jews some moral example. And these are unfortunately more often bad than good. Hence one neutralizes the other, and history proves that men hav imitated more often the bad actions than the good. Ever uppermost in our mind should we keep the effects of ideas and principles on our material and mental condition. Hence as these theological speculations divert the mind from the known to the unknown, from the practical to the impractical, it destroys that much vitality, and impoverishes the mind. Again, as these things take from us the time which should be given to the increasing of our material wealth and to the inventiv genius of man, it becomes clear that theology impoverishes man. Hence biblical theology is set both against the physical, material, and mental interests of man.

The Science of Government.

It is pleasing to be great, but more excellent to be little.—Father James.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Never having been largely great, nor largely little, only about middling, 'tis not mine to question the verity of the sage maxim of the father.

Among the emigrants from this world to the next, of such as figured largely in the affairs of men, I fail to find the first individual who, if a mere wish would obtain it, would not hav a sponge drawn over his past record.

Why?

Because, underlying his most patriotic efforts, he finds, on retrospection, a large substratum of ego, hiding, for the time being, from his own eyes only, the absurdity of his "fantastic tricks before high heaven;" the absurdity of inferring, from his temporary elevation, that he was born to command ad libitum or infinitum.

He now sees that some who were unknown to fame are largely his superiors. He sees there is a power that overrules in the affairs of men; who selects from the material lying about loose such instruments as will best answer the present purpose. When that purpose is accomplished, or the tool becomes dull, it is dropped and another picked up.

In the instrumentalities selected, no new springs to action are created. The springs already there are touched upon.

are chiefly in independent hills or domes, with their apexes from a thousand to over two thousand feet in hight, and one, the lofty Carran-Tual, 3,414 feet high, the loftiest in Ireland. Near the edge of the lakes is a thick growth of good-sized trees with thick green foliage. Though not possessing the magnitude, the grandeur, and sublimity of the lakes of Scotland, particularly Loch Lomond and Loch Katrine, they are very pretty. The islands have a considerable growth of the arbutus, whose rich, glossy leaves remain green the year round.

The upper lake, two and a half miles long, covering an area of 430 acres, is considered the prettiest of the three, because of its wild and picturesque scenery. One cannot examine the high rugged hills surrounding it, its shores, and the deep inlets along the same without being fully impressed with their beauties. The masses of rocks piled up near are called "Coleman's Eye," "The Man-of-War," "The Four Friends." A rugged, precipitous pile, whose pyramidal head is eleven hundred feet high, is the home of the eagle, which here builds its eyrie in an interstice, well toward the top. When the young eagles are hatched out, men have climbed the rock on the accessible side, and, by letting one of their number down with ropes, have captured and carried the young eagles away to rear them in slavery. Here is also a remarkable echo, which, when thoroughly awakened, will reverberate from rocky hill to rocky hill, and be answered from mountain to mountain, sometimes louder and louder without interval, and then fainter and fainter, and after a sudden pause again rising, as if from some distant glen, then insensibly dying away. In this way six different echoes are distinctly counted.

The middle lake, called Muckross, or Torc, containing an area of 680 acres, is regarded as beautiful, but its hills are not so wild, high, and rugged as those surrounding the upper lake. They are connected by a narrow passage winding around among the rocks. In passing the narrow chute we saw two rocks within a few feet of us with what appeared to be the print of human feet deeply imbedded in them, one mark larger than the other. About these indentations various superstitions are held. One version is that the larger one is the mark of the foot of a distinguished old Celt who, when pursued by deadly enemies, made his escape by jumping from that rock to another on the opposite side of the stream, and that the smaller one is the print of his wife's foot. They made a pretty good jump to leap the stream; and, what perhaps is singular, they made a deep impression on the rocks from which they leaped, but none on the rocks upon which they lighted. Possibly they went up, and did not light at all. These appearances of human feet indented in rocks are found in various parts of Ireland, and the most extravagant stories are told in reference to them.

Lough Leane, or the Lower Lake, is much larger than the others, containing five thousand acres, and being five miles in length. Before entering it we passed down a rapid chute, where the waters rush under a weird old bridge said to have been built by the Danes about the time of their incursions into England, and to be the oldest bridge in Ireland. Just above we saw a large condor diving down into the water for fish and then flying majestically away at our approach. Abundance of fish, salmon, trout, etc., abound in these lakes. The lower lake is bordered by hills in its upper portion, but at its lower portion is seen a wide stretch of beautiful farms and cultivated fields. The rugged hills and mountains are, of couse, wild, picturesque, and charming; but a beautiful sheet of water, surrounded by highly-cultivated fields and pleasant homes is certainly not also without its beauty. The lower lake has over thirty islands, but few of them contain an area of over an acre, and several considerably less. In its more rugged portion is a cascade or two much admired.

We were landed near Ross Castle, and in walking through beautiful grounds to it we were not far from the copper mines which formerly turned out much valuable copper ore. They were undoubtedly worked many hundreds, if not thousands, of years ago, by the Danes, or a still earlier class of people. Rude stone hammers have been found in the mines which the aborigines—perhaps the ancient Celts—once used in mining purposes. Ross Castle, now in ruins and covered with beautiful ivy, was formerly the scene of bloody warfare between the wild races and factions that once inhabited this land, but I will not now call up these unpleasant memories. We did not stop long to gaze on the old castle; there are so many of them in Ireland, that after seeing a dozen of them they cease to be a novelty. Here we found our jaunting-car in waiting, which took us by a short route through pleasant drives of shaded roads amongst elegant residences back to the hotel. We found that the lower end of the lakes were much nearer the town of Killarney than the glen to which we were first driven.

We were back in time to take the train for Cork, intending to stop over at Blarney to view the castle, etc., the following morning, but when we arrived there it was intensely black, the rain, which had kindly withheld itself while we were doing up the lakes, was now descending pretty freely, and as no hotel was within three-fourths of a mile and no conveyance to it, we very prudently retook the train and came on to Cork where we readily found a comfortable hotel.

OFFICERS ELECTED AT THE HORNELLSVILLE CONVENTION.—A REQUEST BY THE CORRESPONDING SECRETARY.

The following officers were elected at the Hornellsville Freethinkers' Convention for the New York State Freethinkers' Association:

President: T. L. Brown, M. D., Binghamton, N. Y.

Vice-Presidents: Albany, Thomas Dugan, Albany city; Allegany, Samuel Latta, Friendship; Broom, Eugene Wilber, Binghamton; Cattaraugus, A. L. Branard, Salamanca; Cayuga, L. DeWitt Griswold, Auburn; Chautauqua, E. Mitchell, Jamestown; Chemung, H. Hurty, Elmira; Chenango, A. D. Newman, Norwich; Clinton, G. P. Lapell, Moores; Columbia, Morris Tompkins, Germantown; Cortland, William D. Hunt, Scott; Delaware, Benjamin Green, Barbourville; Erie, Geo. W. Taylor, North Collins; Essex, Dr. Freeman Lyon, Bloomingdale; Franklin, J. G. Reynolds, Bombay; Fulton, Lawrence Fay, Gloversville; Genesee, Dr. Charles Holton, Batavia; Green, John Canine, Leeds; Herkimer, W. J. Lewis, Ilion; Jefferson, Wm. Estus, Cape Vincent; Kings, Wm. A. McAdams, Brooklyn; Lewis, Thomas Bacon, Leyden; Livingston, H. B. McNair, Dansville; Madison, Frank S. Hammond, Bennet's Corners; Monroe, Moses Hays, Rochester; Montgomery, Henry Chapman, Fultonville; New York, A. L. Rawson, New York city; Niagara, J. M. Harwood, Hess Roads; Oneida, S. Hoagg, New York Mills; Onondaga, Isaac Van Schoick, Syracuse; Ontario, John Peck, Naples; Orange, Wm. H. Knapp, Middletown; Orleans, Peter Tanner, Albion; Oswego, W. J. Bradt, North Hannibal; Otsego, Horatio F. Burger, Cherry Valley; Queens, Isaac Sherwood, Manhasset; Rensselaer, Jesse Brown, Troy; Richmond, J. E. Haynes, New Brighton; Rockland, J. Brooks, Sloatsburg; St. Lawrence, J. P. Armstrong, Ogdensburg; Saratoga, J. J. Dunlap, Waterford; Schenectady, Johathan Baker, Schenectady city; Schuyler, C. H. Hibbard, Watkins; Seneca, W. W. Mitchell, West Junius; Steuben, A. B. Stebbins, Canisteo; Suffolk, M. R. Conklin, Northport; Sullivan, C. S. Bennett, Narrowsburg; Tioga, Gilbert Newell, Owego; Tompkins, D. B. Morton, Groton; Ulster, James Young, Melton Post; Washington, R. G. Hurlbut, Whitehall; Wayne, Samuel Cosad, Wolcott; Westchester, W. E. Sutton, Mt. Kisco; Wyoming, W. F. Graves, Castile; Yates, S. S. Ball, Penn Yan.

Recording secretary, Edgar M. Sellon, Dewar; corresponding secretary, H. L. Green, Salamanca; treasurer, Amy Post, Rochester.

Executiv Committee: O. H. P. Kinney, Waverly; Dr. A. Robinson, McLean; Sigmund Block, Cape Vincent; David Cosad, Jr., Oaks Corners; Mrs. Asenath Macdonald, New York city; Clement Austin, Rochester; and C. Houghton, Batavia.

For the purpose of informing the above-named officers as to what are their duties, I copy the following from the Articles of Association of this society:

"The officers shall be a president, one vice-president from each county, a recording secretary, a corresponding secretary, and a treasurer: also an executiv committee of seven who shall hav the general supervision of the association. The duties of the officers shall be those usually pertaining to these positions with the additional duties hereinafter mentioned.

"The vice-president of each county shall, immediately after his election, appoint two other persons of the county to act with him, and the three shall be the Freethought and Liberal committee of the county, the vice-president to be the chairman, and it shall be his duty to notify the corresponding secretary of this association who his associates are when they are appointed. The duty of these county committees shall be to carry out the objects of this association, and also to co-operate with the National Liberal League in all practical ways."

I desire to call the attention of the persons who hav been elected vice-presidents of this association to the above statement of their duties, and request them to comply with it at once. We must do a great work for Liberalism in the Empire state the coming year. If any person who has been elected to office in this association, for any reason cannot discharge his duties, let him resign, and we will hav President Brown fill the vacancy.

The most important work that each county committee can perform is to greatly increase the circulation of the Liberal papers. As soon as those committees are formed they should set about this work. There should be ten Liberal papers taken where there is one now. And each county committee should see to it that at least one Liberal convention is held in their county during the year.

Friends, you hav again reëlected me as your corresponding secretary. If you will uphold my hands I will discharge my duties. I will speak for our cause in any place in the state if my actual expenses are guaranteed. We are to meet in annual convention at Watkins next August. Let us carry on a brave campaign against ignorance and superstition from now until then, so that when that convention assembles there may be at least twenty-five earnest representativs from each of the counties of our state present. Ho! For the Iowa Convention, Everybody!

AT CEDAR RAPIDS, SEPT. 24TH, 25TH, AND 26TH.—HART AND WETZEL'S HALL.

Come up to the councils of the champions of equal rights. Let us work to receive the universal supremacy of justice. Men and women! friends of universal mental liberty! remember the time and place. One and all, come. E. C. WALKER, Sec.

New Leagues and New Members.

I am happy to announce three new auxiliaries, as follows: No. 223 Big Horn, Wy. Ter., Wm. A. Martin, Secretary; No. 224, Cedar Falls, Iowa, L. W. Maxwell, Secretary; No. 225, Greene, Iowa, Johnnie Wilson, Secretary. Also the following new annual members, making 106 in all: M. Farrington, Edgar L. Farrington, Mrs. Ann L. Farrington, Miss Ianthe A. Farrington, all of Denver, Iowa; Mrs. Delia J. Jacob and Mrs. Maria Repp, Waterloo, Iowa; H. J. Woodhouse, Wilmington, Del. Also one new life member, making eleven life members in all: Henry Sheffield, M.D., Nashville, Tenn.

The two Iowa Leagues above are got up, as so many hav been before, by our indefatigable worker, E. C. Walker.

All auxiliaries, life and annual members will recollect that the Fifth Annual Congress of the League will be held this year in Hershey Hall, Chicago, Sept. 30th and Oct. 1st and 2d.

The Two Liberals of Hunter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

After two months' summering in the Catskill Mountains, during which time the weekly visits of your paper were doubly welcome, I return to the city of ashes, if not of sackcloth too. That alone should not hav determined my writing to you, but I thought you might be interested with an account of the germination of Liberalism in Hunter, the village where I stopped. I could fill pages for you with the description of the many charms of the "heart of the Catskills," but, as Liberals, we long rather for the charms of freedom of thought and being; so I keep to the point.

I met with only two Liberals, which, however, in that church-dotted region rather astonished me. The first of these, Dr. Mead, is a very intelligent man, and, as my wife expressed it even before we knew he was a Liberal, about the only genteel-looking person in the village. He seemed very glad to find me, like himself, a lover of the liberty of thought and state secularization. The doctor is a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. In spite of his being a pronounced admirer of Mr. Ingersoll, he enjoys the respect of every one as a man and as a physician. His practice is very large. He honors our cause in his section, and his influence must result in the development of Freethought among the new generation at least. Possibly were he so minded he could furnish us with some details about the condition of Liberalism in Hunter which may hav escaped me, although we had much conversation together. At our last interview several questions I had meant to ask were cut short by the advent of patients coming to this liberal fountain of health. I did not mean a jest, but italicized the word so you could take your choice.

The other Liberal I met is a skilled ornamenter in one of the Hunter factories, a Mr. Burt. He formerly belonged to the Church of England, but, falling across the lectures of Robert Ingersoll, he was made to see the untenability of the Christian doctrins, and renounced them forever. The "Skulls" startled him; the "Gods" were too many for him; and "What Must We Do to Be Saved?" converted him. His Liberalism has not been activ so far. It has remained entirely individual. The fact is that Mr. Burt has not seen any of our Liberal publications. He was ignorant even of the existence of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Man, and other manly and Liberal sheets.

These two gentlemen should leaven the whole lump of Hunter. I do not see why a Liberal club could not be organized there. Doubtless there are others who would join it. The separation of church and state and the freedom of thought must be objects desired by many who are not declared Liberals. And the population of that region (although evidently pious in the very orthodox sense of the word) seems well endowed with mental qualifications—rather exceptionally so, it even appears to me. So Liberalism should hav an easy victory if it made a show for battle.

But having said all that could be of interest to you at present, I remain, Very sincerely yours,

New York, Sept. 6th. EDMOND GASTINEAU.

Letters from Friends.

WILKESBARRE, PA., Sept. 3, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: Mr. Bennett having embarked on his long trip around the world, it remains for us to keep the sheet afloat, and continue the agitation and discussion of such subjects as will interest your many readers.

I am astonished to find so many intelligent persons getting a wrong idea of what Mr. Bennett teaches and believes. One writer, Mr. Shafer, from Ohio, says, "I hav read with great interest his essay, 'Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind,' and I think it clearly demonstrated to every thinking, inquiring mind, the non-existence of any creativ or supernatural power outside the universe, and that matter is eternal, self-existent, and inflnit, and that life and mind are the products of matter."

It has been demonstrated time after time that unless matter has life it cannot in any way change. If it had no life it could not be acted upon, and as it is inert, having no power to move itself, as a mass, except by a force, the fact that it does constantly change and move in mass is evidence that it has life and that there it force in the universe.

Mr. Bennett teaches that life produces various degrees of organization, and that owing to these stages various degrees of mind are exhibited, but I do not understand him to say that "life and mind are the products of matter," unless you take matter in that sense to mean life itself. There must be life in matter before a complete organization is effected, and it is necessary to effect an organization in order to produce mind. The essential, however, is life.

As an illustration take the subject of magnetism. It is the nature of magnetism to arrange atoms into a positiv and negativ relation. In fact, each atom becomes a complete magnet. If we take a horseshoe magnet and divide it into ten millions of parts, each part will instantly become a magnet, and no subdivision of atoms, by the finest sense of perceptiv division, can alter this fact. The magnetism then must be the real force, and the material, the thing through which it acts. Now one of two conclusions must be held; either magnetism is a universal force manifesting itself through the particles of iron to the greatest degree, or else iron is the force. But how absurd to say that iron, the material, is the force, when we know that in some conditions iron is not a magnet! Any ordinary mind must see then that there are forces in nature which manifest themselvs through materiality, and hence these forces must be superior to matter, or the thing acted upon. I submit whether this is not a definit conclusion. In every department of nature the greatest potencies lie hidden from view. The material is but the outside shell, while the real force is unseen, and is unknown except by its manifestations. In reasoning upon these subjects it is the easiest thing in the world to get the cart before the horse, but please remember that whether you hitch the horse end about or not, the load will not move unless he pushes or pulls it.

I ask the simple question, Is there no difference between magnetism and iron? Or between it and any other material upon which it acts? By the division of a magnet and the polarity of all its parts it is shown that the law of polarity is a property of magnetism. If we strew iron filings upon a sheet of paper, and place it in contact with a battery, the filings immediately arrange themselvs in five piles, one central mass and four smaller lots, so that magnetism will immediately polarize any confused number of particles, and arrange them into an orderly condition. If it can do this on a sheet of paper it can do it in relation to the larger masses, called worlds, and by the law of their attraction, corresponding to their distances and masses, a perfect harmony of motion is the result. This the great mind of Kepler comprehended, and hence his law. A human being, composed of more varied materials, a more complex mechanism, is but a superb magnetic machine, and he feels only the breaking of those currents which act upon him, and enjoys the life of those movements. In fact, all that he is and all that he can be is but the result of this life. Man essentially is sensation. Now upon an outside inference it will be argued that when the machine dissolves, man must cease to exist. This does not follow. I hav just shown you that by breaking the magnet the magnetism is not destroyed. Man possesses magnetism, which can no more be destroyed than could that of the magnet. If, therefore, the highest form of magnetic life was necessary to organize man, a thinking and feeling being, we are justified in concluding that this superior production remains intact, and may exist, supported upon higher and finer material.

I do not understand Mr. Bennett to argue that there can be no future for man, but he does say that whatever exists must of necessity be a part of the universe, and there can be no room outside for any such God as he of whom theology teaches. In fact, there is no such God. He is but the creation of the weak and and inconsistent imaginings of an ignorant people, endeavoring to account for what they could not understand.

There is every reason, scientific and otherwise, to believe in the endless duration of matter, in all its conditions, and a force or forces which manifest through it, and the highest developments of material science up to this time establish this great truth; but whether this polarity and organization which result in what we call mind shall continue after the outward body is changed or dissolved must depend upon another set of evidences above and outside of the ordinary operations of materiality.

That such evidences of identity and individuality exist, and can be established, is believed by a large and increasing class of our best minds, and no superficial observations of the stay-away thinkers will ever solve this problem. If there is no possibility to destroy even one particle of matter or its life, why should it be possible to destroy the most perfectly organized force, which we call mind and spirit? The Materialist argues that to produce a mind which shall endure after death, would be like having a spring flow up hill and giv us the purest water at the summit, but he forgets that it is just what we appear to see from day to day—everything grows from the lower to a higher condition. It is this very fact that the child is first, and afterward the man, indicates first the man and then an angel.

In referring to my first argument about the magnet I may say this, Can we conceive of such a state as matter which is not atomic? As far as it is possible for the imagination to go, we find the force we call by the name or magnetism to exist, and if so we may reasonably infer that it is one of the inherent forces of matter. All bodies will attract or repel each other—I mean all masses—and, as above stated, every atom of every mass has its polarity, the one end positiv while the other end is negativ. The mind of man cannot consistently reason away the atomic constitution of matter. The thought is absurd; matter cannot be destroyed by division, nor its force either. Matter and force are coexistent and coeternal, and man is one of the various forms of its manifestation. And when the outward man ceases the spirit will, undoubtedly, be found not unconnected with matter by any means; and if it is impossible to destroy one of the conditions of matter, polarization, why should we argue that a much higher, the highest form of magnetic life we are acquainted with, a perfectly matured mind, should cease to control any matter but in this crude state?

There is one thought in connection with this subject that is interesting. It is that the fact of life implies motion. If but one atom of matter were destitute of life and motion, all other atoms might crowd upon it and thus destroy all other masses. All worlds would thus be piled upon the central mass, to their absolute destruction and confusion, but no world is devoid of motion; they are subject to the magnetic law of polarization, and attraction and repulsion exist through nature in every department. To illustrate: If the sun were to remain in one spot, and become motionless, and still exercise the magnetic power she does, it is evident that one planet after another would be hurled upon her mass; but the reason that this does not occur is because when each planet arrives at any given place at which the sun was, and from which its attractions came, she is not there, but has moved away by the attraction of some force acting upon her. Another, and a most important, fact is that the polarity givs the sun and all bodies both attractiv and repulsiv power. One end of each atom is positiv, while the other is negativ. So of each mass, each world, each sun. This is why when a planet passes its perihelion it is repelled and is thus compelled to chase its sun in sportiv glee on through the countless ages of the future. You will see by this law that we stand a good chance to exist for a considerable time in this play of magnetic life, and we can afford to let the Second Adventists and world destroyers howl away at their confounded and gloomy congregations, while good old Mother Nature goes on in her even way dispensing life and beauty, as well as death and its lessons, all around.

There seems to be a tendency in thinking minds of our time to run in the direction of some one force, hence the doctrin of the conservation of force. But it is a question whether there are not many forms of force. We hav adhesion in matter that has but little magnetic force; it may be the same force, but it is questionable. My impression is that the mind of man is manifested by means of an organization of all the forces, so to speak. Hence he has every force and every quality of life in nature below him. He seems to be a superior result of all the forms of force in this world, and, while subject to still higher forms of force, it is altogether probable that his real life will begin when this ceases to be.

I hav thrown these thoughts together for the consideration of our friend, sister Elmina, and others who are so content with this atom of life that they are not inclined to bother about a larger mass.

RIGHT AND WRONG AND MATERIALISM.

MR. EDITOR: The fact that right and wrong, as generally understood by the masses, is continually changing with the ideas of the age and individual, makes right and wrong a matter of ethics and history, and separates the same from the natural, abstract, or eternal right and wrong. While the ethical idea is the reflection of the moral conditions of the ages and races, the abstract idea is based upon the law of nature or of matter.

The answer to the question, "How could Materialism say stealing or any other iniquity is wrong or right?" can be solved in a very material way. A theft produces upon the loser a feeling of regret for the lost object. The physiognomical expression of the loser again rouses the pity of the witness of such a regret, and there are the feelings that a wrong has been committed.

The abstract difference of right or wrong is dependent on the effect that a deed produces on other individuals. Approval or disapproval, any modification of the individual, changes it into the ethical right and wrong, and depends on the character of the individuals; for instance, the thief might think the arrest of a brother thief as a wrong done to them. The ethical right and wrong often goes straight against the abstract idea.

The Spartans taught their children stealing. The Hebrews slaughtered their children as sacrifices to their God, and thought it very meritorious to butcher their captivs.

As to polygamy, the nations on earth are still in doubt whether it is right or wrong. With us stealing is wrong, but driving a "good bargain" is held to be right, though it is nothing else but stealing in another form.

Again. A man who does not find justice before the law by corrupt judges has, in the abstract sense, a right to help himself, though it is against the prevailing ethical idea, and therefore punished by law.

Approval or disapproval are thoughts, and they are caused by sight, hearing, or feeling, and thoughts are always produced by external objects through the sensorial nerves. Whether these thoughts are the immediate effects of recent perceptions or effects of past perceptions, we ever will hav the feeling or sight or sound (in our imagination, as they say) reproduced, and that sometimes so lively, for instance in dreaming, that we are often in doubt whether we hav heard or seen or felt or were merely dreaming.

If animals of the higher order from birth on were excluded from all and any perceptions, they had certainly no thought whatever, and if they move their motions were not caused by perception, or thoughts of any kind, but by mere nervous reflex action, as a piece of the flesh of a recently killed fish exhibits motion when pricked with a needle.

Memory is thus but the preserved perception acting in after times.

At the present there is not known how thoughts are converted into motion and how perceptions initiate the thought process, but all the newer discoveries in the electrical science makes such an explanation possible.

That force which we call "electric" is the cause of all chemical processes, the cause of motion and gravity of light and temperature. Attraction and repulsion, cohesion and adhesion, one of them can be converted into the other.

If we hold force (electrical) is an inseparable part of matter, or that force causes the physical differences of matter, all those phenomena are "dynamical" or "material" effects.

In the camera obscura light causes the same effect on the chemical film as in the eye on the retina, and that "material" picture on the retina is "telegraphed" to the brain, which is also matter.

The same is the case with hearing or feeling. So far that is clear. But whether the perception or thought itself is to be explained by motions of the cerebral molecules or in a different way, that is not known.

Still so much is apparent, that thoughts are effects caused by the influence of matter, and further on, thoughts are the causes of material changes, motions of muscles, even often of disintegration and disease.

A Song.

"I want you to put me where I can see the ocean."
—President Garfield.

Afar from the deep blue sea,
Afar from thy choral of waves,
A child who hath roamed by thee
For thy murmuring music craves;
For the laugh of thy billows that bound
In play amid shells on the shore,
Or dashing o'er rocks that resound
A troubled and stormy roar.

Let him for the greenwood sigh
Whose home is its leafy bower—
Whose hearth at the twilight hour
Offers emblems of peace to the sky.
His may be the breeze
That rustles the forest flower,
Or stirreth a thousand trees
To an anthem of strength and power.

But giv me the sea-girt isle,
My forefathers' home and grave.
That basks in the mutual smile
Of sunlight and rippling wave.
Its billows seem all my own,
And the skies more dear to me,
Whose arch rests fondly down
On the breast of the heaving sea.

—Charles Carter, Jr.

Sunrise in Old Trinity.

BY C. BRADLEY.

I, as a forester, the groves may tread,
E'en till the Eastern gate all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune with fair blessed beams,
Turns into yellow gold his salt, green streams.
—Shakspere.

The shade-haunting bird
Whose charmed throat hath stirred
All night the dream pulse of the dark,
With a soft dying hush
At Aurora's first blush
Givs up his sweet song to the lark.

See through the tall trees,
Yet unkissed by the breeze,
That fringe the waved ridge, the sun,
With a sweet golden grace
On his round, blessed face,
Begin his day's journey to run.

The winged song doth fly
From the vale to the sky
To greet the dawning ray.
And our hearts unite
In the joy of the light
To hail the glorious day.

"The sun is up, the hills are bright,
The waves are dancing in the light;
The sun hath left the vale
To labor then with merry hearts
Until again the sun departs
And western skies look pale."

Paddle Your Own Canoe.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

You must obey, the parsons say,
Or burn in brimstone blue;
You must not call your soul your own,
Nor paddle your own canoe.

But never mind the hell-fire threats
Of the black-coated crew;
Don't let them scare your wits away,
But paddle your own canoe.

They only want to get your cash,
Your bread they want to chew;
But don't you feed the lazy set,
Just paddle your own canoe.

Though dupes support a swarm of priests
That stick to them like glue,
Oh, keep your pelf for wife and self,
And paddle your own canoe.

Yes, bid farewell to priests and hell;
Bid slavish creeds adieu;
Just steer your boat to wisdom's port,
And paddle your own canoe.

Do unto others as you would
Hav others do to you;
One life or clime take at a time,
And paddle your own canoe.

Don't be enslaved on gospel ships
By Gentile or by Jew;
With truth keep trim, then sink or swim,
Just paddle your own canoe.

Should bigots vote to swamp your boat,
Show them a thing or two;
Kick theirs to bits with science's aid,
Then paddle your own canoe.

Oh, let no empty laughs or jeers
Drive you from what is true;
Let parsons roar till they are sore,
Just paddle your own canoe.

The Enigma of Mercy.

BY FRANK FELT.

"His mercy endureth forever."—Bible.
"The same I will rise and explain."—Truthful Jas.
"Take such a place as some call hell,
Where sin and your big devil dwell;
If from it truth and God had fled,
The institution would be dead."—Jno Craig.

Amen! Hallelujah! Forever
The Lord in his righteousness reigns.
The chosen are saved, and the many
Are lost as his goodness ordains.
The almighty boss won the battle;
Old Satan's put under his feet;
And smoke-clouds of anguish arising
Fill heaven with aroma sweet.

There stands a big bellows in heaven,
Right back of Jehovah's throne,
With air-pipes strung from its nozzle
Way down to the fiery zone.
And sometimes an angel gets lazy
And rusts for the want of use,
His bright wings flopping and twisted,
His harp-strings twanging and loose.
Then Michael says, "Here, you loafer!
Just pump these 'ere bellows a spell,
And warm up your poor old mother,
A-shivering down in hell."

There are those in this heavenly kingdom
With friends in the torment below,
But the cords that had bound them when mortal
Are broke, and the burden of woe
That sympathy bears for another
Rests never upon them again,
For conscience is freed from the kindness
That made them do good unto men.

A sweet little angel cherub,
All rosy and smiling and bright,
With joy written over his forehead
In the glow of eternity's light,
Comes up from the beautiful river,
With ecstasy sweet and unshammed,
To send down a blast on a sister
Who went to a dance and was damned.

A father and mother together
Come up in ineffable joy,
To force down a whiff of pure justice
For the flames round a dear little boy,
Who laughed by mistake when the deacon
Broke down with a cough in his prayer,
And died with the crime unforgiven,
To go down to hell and despair.

"All washed in the blood and made whiter
Than snow," and with purity crowned,
A murderer swung from the gallows
Comes joyfully walking around.
And creak goes the mighty engin,
And downward the rich stream is driven,
To blow up the coals that are roasting
The wife that he killed—unforgiven.

A fine old angelical deacon,
Who once distilled whisky on earth,
And sold it around to his neighbors
For thrice what it really was worth,
Takes hold of the handle and turns it
On one who from godliness fell
By drinking his orthodox whisky,
To burn in an orthodox hell.

O beautiful rest for the weary!
O joy that shall be to all men!
O beautiful scheme of salvation!
That saves about one out of ten.
Sweet message of love from the ages!
Sweet story that ever is new!
"Believe or be damned to perdition."
I believe! I'll be damned if I do!

PLAGIARISM

Now ready. A tract of sixteen pages, containing three articles yclept sermons, entitled,

1. Shame! Sham! Pshaw!
2. Dogs!
3. Cock-a-doodle-doo!

The first two of these appeared in the Seymour Times in reply to aspersions by William Emmette Coleman, and although he had been allowed four times the space I occupied, and a further reply was absolutely necessar y on my part, yet was I refused a further hearing. In the last article or sermon, rejected by the Seymour Times, I prove beyond all doubt that W. E. Coleman plagiarized f rom my pamphlet "Sunday n ot the Sabbath" (43 pages, 1872), all that he quoted or summarized in his tract entitled "Sabbath Observance" (18 pages. 1879), from Justin. Irenæus, Tertullian, Victorinus Origen, Eusebius, Jerome, Luther, Melancthon, Heylin, Milton, Baxter, Paley and Neander; and that every reference made to the above authors, and every statement taken the refrom, was borrowed from my work. Other indubitable proofs of plagiarism will be given.

RELIGION

AS REVEALED BY THE

Material and Spiritual Universe.

ILLUSTRATED.

By Edwin D. Babbitt.

It treats of the Existence and General Character of God, God as a Spirit, the Nature of God, Creeds and Practices of Christianity, The Dangers of Infallible Standards, The Christian Bible Tested, Religions Tested by their Fruits, Life and Death Under the Old Religions, Life and Death Under a Spiritual Religion, The Future Religion.

The book is a scientific, philosophical treatis upon the above and other subjects, by a thorough scholar. He is widely known by his "Principles of Light and Color," "Health Manual," etc., and this new book is sure to be read with even greater interest than those.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable. as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin. Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating. and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS are the marvel of the world.
They are dumbfounding the scientists and physicians, and making glad the hearts of the people.

OPEN LETTER.

TO THE PHYSICIANS, CHEMISTS, AND ELECTRICIANS OF BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK

GENTLEMEN: A little over a year ago I arrived in the city of Brooklyn from Europe, and at 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, commenced the sale of my patented Magnetic clothing, advertised and known as the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Garments. I addressed a circular letter to a large number of medical men in Brooklyn, in which I fully described the nature of my invention, at the same time pointing out to them the rationale of my method of cure. A few members of the profession accepted my offer, and visited me for the purpose of having my invention fully explained to them. Of those who came there was not one but readily accepted my theory of disease, and recognized the possibilities of cure by my method, but a number of those written to so forgot themselves and their character of gentlemen as to openly insult me by the return of my letters and in other ways openly expressed their bitterness of thought by designating me a CHARLATAN and a fraud. This line of conduct impelled me to open warfare against the now universal system of DRUG TREATMENT; but knowing as I do that there are many noble men in the profession who are ever ready to examin and accept that which is really beneficial and efficacious, no matter from what source it may come. With this fact before me, I am constrained to call upon the faculty of Brooklyn and New York, and respectfully invite them to visit my Manufactory and Consulting Rooms, when I will explain fully everything connected with my method of treatment. I will giv them the names and addresses in Brooklyn and New York of hundreds of its best citizens, who hav under my system recovered from every form of malady known to Nosologists, and this without a single dose of medicin. I am, moreover, prepared to take a patient from every physician in Brooklyn that he has given over as an incurable case, and place upon such patients to the number of FIVE HUNDRED, a suit of my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, free of charge, and will undertake to cure ninety per cent of all those handed over to me, within twelve months from the time of putting on my GARMENTS, my only condition being that PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT bind themselves not to giv or use medicin of any kind. I will sign bonds for five thousand dollars, to be given to any institution named, should I in the twelve months fail to cure ninety per cent of all their incurables under their several systems. I will also at once hand over $5,000 worth of my appliances to any hospital, free of charge, to be placed upon the sick poor in such institution, bonds to be given in this case also, that medicin will not be given in any way.
This is a standing offer for twelve months from date.
The following physicians may be referred to as having witnessed the effects of my GARMENTS:

Prof. CARMICHAEL,	Dr. ELTINGE,
FORDES BARKER,	Dr. THAYER,
Dr. DEMEREST	Dr. TINKER,
Dr. CLARK,	Dr. TRUE.

The following gentlemen can also be referred to: Commissioner Garrison, J. B. Hoyt, Spruce street; Col. Bayard Clark, Judge Levi Parsons, E. Sinclair Clark, Lafayette avenue; J. W. Littlefield, artist; Mr. Frazer, corner of Reid avenue and Broadway. These, with thousands of others, hav worn my garments. Therefore, gentlemen, in conclusion I most respectfully submit that you owe a duty to yourselvs and the public to inquire into the nature of the invention thus presented to you. But knowing, as I do, that all new remedies for the cure of disease should be well attested scientifically by practicing physicians before being generally prescribed, I herewith offer you every facility for testing the same, and would respectfully call your attention to a portion of Professor Parson's lecture, published in Baltimore this week. You will therein see the necessity for your inquiry as to the position that magnetism is destined to take among the REMEDIAL AGENCIES now prescribed through your colleges. Hoping that you will seriously and in a fair spirit inquire into the nature of my invention, I remain,
Very respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

READ THE FOLLOWING PORTION OF A LECTURE. BY PROFESSOR PARSONS, AND SAY HOW MUCH LONGER CAN THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN RESIST THE INQUIRY WHICH THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM DEMANDS.

MORE LIGHT.

THE HARMONY OF THE SPHERES.

DISCOVERY OF THE UNIVERSAL PREVALENCE

OF A PRINCIPLE THAT GRANDLY MANIFESTS THE WISDOM AND GOODNESS

OF ALMIGHTY GOD.

Professor W. H. Parsons, a talented and modest gentleman, who is now a resident of our city, has made a discovery that is likely to be regarded with the deepest interest by men of science everywhere, since it not only explains much heretofore mysterious in astronomical science, but is calculated to impress all minds with more profound admiration for the wisdom and goodness of Almighty God.
This discovery is that the sublime principle of MAGNETIC REPULSION is coextensiv with MAGNETIC ATTRACTION throughout our universe. This magnetic repulsion has equal potency with Newton's law of the ATTRACTION OF GRAVITATION in regulating the movements of all celestial bodies and maintaining harmony among them all. This principle was first developed in the course of manifestations and experiments of Professor Parsons, who is an electro-therapeutist, or medical electrician, while making researches into the relations of electro-magnetism to animal life, disease, and death.
Without attempting to trace how far previous advances of science had prepared the way for the grand discovery by Professor Parsons to which we desire to call attention, we may interest our readers by glancing at the great facts in magnetic philosophy.
Magnetism and electricity—the one the manifestation of the other, with different forms of motion; the one vibratory, as light and heat; the other spiral, as demonstrated by the induction balance, each convolution possessed with magnetic poles—are neither imponderable fluids nor atomic streams, but forces known only from results, the direction of the individual force in each molecule of all magnets, whether in the blood or the heavens, being the opposit of the force in its vicinity, giving rise to a magnetic force, says Maxwell, of extreme complexity, but which, by its repellant as well as its attractiv power, works order out of apparent and really original chaos, and under law established at creation's dawn is the principle of all motion and all life in every kingdom of nature, either in the heavens above or the earth beneath.
Perfect polarization, whereby like poles repel and unlike attract and neutralize each other, whether in the celestial system, including our own planet, or the circulatory system of the blood and nerves, of what is as fearfully, wonderfully, and as curiously made—the divine organism of man—is the source and law [it is not attraction of gravitation, affirmed by Newton, or the undefined centripetal and centrifugal forces of scientists], but the omnipotent and omnipresent governing force which maintains all motion, all life, all health, and all harmony in the cosmogony of the universe.
The law (attraction and repulsion) in each molecular current, or rings of electricity, in either the circular corpuscles which float in arterial or venous blood, or the circular orbs which float in the firmament of the heavens, is the now manifest and realized omnipresent and omnipotent attribute of nature and nature's god by which worlds and all celestial bodies, including comets, are sustained in space without possibility of collision, and all motion, whether orbital or axital, has become the harmony of the spheres.
Its disturbance in the one is the source of all commotion, celestial (as solar magnetic storms) or terrestrial, inward, as in the magnetic shocks of the earthquake, or outward, in electric storms by land or sea. Its interruption in the animal organism whereby the ultimate electric molecules of the blood, tissues, nerves, and muscles, each with a positiv and negativ pole (recently discovered and announced to exist by Shettle Scoutellon, of Paris, and Dubois Reymond), become non-electric or demagnetized, in which non-electric state, says Reymond, these molecules are turned toward each other with like poles so that two become one, possessed of one positive zone and two negativ poles, and when in the electrotonic state unequal or unlike poles are turned toward each other. This non-electric or demagnetized state of the iron molecules of the blood, or the electric molecules of the nerves and muscles is, therefore, the source of all disorder and all diseases in the human cosmos.
I may be, and we believe it is, the law that the celestial strangers known as comets are magnetic regulators designed to resupply the wasted magnetic forces of the spheres they traverse in space, creating apparent temporary disturbance and increased activity in the magnetic forces of the sun, plainly visible in the solar spectrum, and due, says Lockyear, in a recent lecture before the Royal Astronomical Society, to the ejection of heated matter in the interior of the sun, the result of increased temperature and consequent breaking up of magnetic iron in the sun into simpler constituents.
Whatever weight is due to this theory of magnetic restoration of exhausted planets—illustrated in the increased temperature of the sun thus excited by the positiv forces of its late and still freshly announced celestial visitors—it has been demonstrated that the electro magnetic or nervo electric vital forces of the human organism can be uniformly replenished and resupplied and reinvigorated and revitalized from the very verge of dissolution and partial demagnetization of the ultimate electric molecules of blood and nerves by the trutiful application of the maxim of the great German Esculapius, that like cures like, with the universal law of proper polarization, celestial and terrestrial, revealed and understood, man may and will control its forces; unlock the arcana of nature in all her kingdoms; stand within the veil face to face with the magnetic source of universal life and motion; and the preventiv of decay and premature death approach to comprehend with a spirit of exultation and awe the now revealed, yet still invisible, power, which, when darkness was upon the face of the deep and chaos reigned, moved upon the face of the waters, uttered the supreme fiat, and solar magnetism burst upon a primeval world, bathed it in light, and then as now, invested it with life and clad it in beauty.

THE "WILSONIA."

The "Wilsonia" will cure every form of disease that is curable without medicin of any kind, change of diet or occupation. Magnetism is all that is needed when any portion of the human organism is deranged. It is by the forces of magnetism that the stars are kept in their orbits, and the heavenly bodies bear witness to God's omniscience in his first grand conception of so simple a method as the polarization of ultimate atoms, whereby the repellant and attractiv forces thus inhering keep constant and in order all vegetable, animal, and mineral life, there being even in minerals ample evidence of life forces, although to our senses they may appear dead.
The forces of cohesion in mineral and aeriform bodies are but modifications of the same magnetic law, and the disintegration and breaking up of the atoms forming the mass is only another form of death; actual death cannot be; all is changed; nothing ever dies; its form is alone altered. Disease, therefore, is nothing more than an alteration of polarities, whereby the organism is disarranged. If, therefore, we can by any means keep the peculiar polarities of our organic structure in perfect unison, then disease cannot be; and knowing as we do that the blood is the regulator of our being by virtue of its circulation, such circulation being animated by electric nerve fluids keeping in constant magnetic condition the atoms of iron in the blood; but when nature be impaired or exhausted, then any perfect artificial magnetization will restore the diseased organism, no matter what name may hav been given to the malady.

THE "WILSONIA"

Magnetic Garments are nature's true remedy for every ill, and there is not in the world such testimony as can be found here, in Brooklyn and New York, as to the wonderful yet simple treatmeut of disease.

The "WILSONIA" will cure any of the following forms of disease:

Paralysis,
Inflammatory Rheumatism,
Anchylasis,
Asthma,
Bronchitis,
Inflammation of the Lungs
Heart Disease,
Albuminous Urine,
Locomotor Ataxia,
Gout,
Varicose Veins,
Catarrh,
Pneumonia,
Bleeding at the Lungs,
Congestion of the Kidneys,
Spinal Disease.

Evidence of this we can giv from the experience of over THIRTY THOUSAND persons.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.
Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.
☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

"Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

"The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

LET any fair-minded person read the "Light of Asia," and note how similar the supernatural incidents are in many instances to the supernatural incidents in the New Testament narrations, and the conceit that Christianity is a supernatural religion, or the only one, must receive a magnificent rebuke. Here are supernatural incidents related so remarkably similar to those of the New Testament that, if the latter are accepted as so many facts, there is no reason why the former should not be, in which case we hav two supernatural religions on our hands. But there is another horn to the dilemma. It is from the similarity of these incidents to infer that human nature is a wonder-loving, wonder-making power, and that especially it loves to clothe with supernatural traits the wisest teachers and the greatest benefactors of mankind. Drawing this inference, instead of finding ourselvs with two supernatural religions on our hands, we find ourselvs without any supernatural religion at all—a very satisfactory and sensible conclusion, to which I trust the "Light of Asia" will guide many feet that now stumble in darkness.—Chadwick's Conduct of Life.

MY neighbor, an educated and fairly intelligent man, scorns the circumstantial account in Herodotus of the sun's veering from its wonted course; understanding what an upturning of nature it would hav been and how none could hav survived to testify to it, or hav been born to write about it afterward; in short, how impossible any such thing was, and how incredible such a narrativ is to be regarded in our day, though carefully recorded by the historian, and vouched for by the Egyptian priests. And this same fairly intelligent neighbor reads in his Bible of a similar event having happened in Palestine to giv the Israelites more time to slaughter their adversaries (Joshua x, 13) and again at the choice of a Hebrew king for a sign that the LORD (Yaveh) had changed his mind concerning him (2 Kings xx, 10-11). And these latter accounts my neighbor receives with as easy and childlike a faith as if he were still in the nursery, or as if he had never learned and pronounced upon the intrinsic incredibleness of such fantastic traditions.—Waters's Through Rome On.

IF a man declared to me that he was "inspired," I could not argue the matter with him; I could only say that his inspiration, whatever it might be worth to him, was purely his and availed me nothing. A thorough acquaintance with all the possibilities of nature no man can possess or pretend to. Not having this impossible comprehension of nature, and not being supernaturally "inspired," I could not then assert of any proved fact (much less of something unproved) that it was supernatural.—Waters's Through Rome On.

THEY also are to be had accursed that presume to say, That every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law and the light of nature. For holy scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved.—Church of England, Art. xiii.

THE Westminster Confession teaches the same doctrin and with no uncertain sound: so that the established churches of England and Scotland, as well as their innumerable copyists in America, are committed to a lie, as is shown in the following extract: There is no universal religion. The notion that there is has filled the earth with horrors and wailing until now. All organized religions are alike human growths from roots of error. To esteem one division at the expense of the rest is a poor partisan superstition. The religions which Christianity calls false are as really true and good for the people that hold them as Christianity is true and good for its disciples. If the good side of religion has been nobly exhibited by Christians so it has been by heathens for even a longer period of time; and alas for the lofty and exclusiv pretensions of Christianity! the earthliness of its nature has been abundantly demonstrated through the nineteen centuries of modern history in which the evil side of religion has been so painfully contrasted with the good.—Waters's Through Rome On.

[In giving these extracts for the column entitled "Gems of Thought" it has been my custom for the last two or three years to content myself with adding the author's name, and, if I sometimes add the name of the work from which the extract is taken, it is in the hope of attracting the attention of inquiring spirits and inducing them to read the work for themselvs; but I hav seldom or never sought to direct specific attention to any individual work. In transcribing passages from such writers as Max Muller, J. S. Mill, Leslie Stephen, etc., as also from Ingersoll, Underwood, Bradlaugh, Annie Besant, etc., I feel that I am doing a good work, and I am filled with confidence that many of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav recourse to the original sources to edify and satisfy themselvs. But if the editor will not think it an intrusion on his proper office, I would fain embrace this opportunity to recommend to special notice the work of Mr. Waters. If they are already familiar, as without boasting or vanity I may assume that I am, with say Greg's "Creed of Christendom," Amberley's "Analysis," Parker's "Matters Pertaining to Religion," Froude's "Nemesis," "Supernatural Religion," Strauss, Renan, and the numerous works of the same school of thought that hav been within the last half century issued both on this side and the other side of the Atlantic, they will, I am sure, enjoy "Through Rome On" with an intense feeling of delight and satisfaction. It is a most candid and fearless exposition of a life of thoughtful investigation, and it cannot fail to guide the feet of those who are earnestly endeavoring to keep the strait path of truth and soberness. I hav never seen Mr. Waters, and I never expect to see him, as I already considerably exceed the three score years and ten said to be allotted to man; but I wish to thank him audibly for his noble work and to recommend it to all earnest and candid inquirers—C. W. C.]

AND one said unto him, Lord, are there few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in by the narrow door; for many, I say unto you shall seek to enter in and shall not be able.—Luke xiii, 23-24.

Odds and Ends.

STILL waters run deep, but not in the modern hollow-bottomed bottles in which still waters are sold.

IT is now claimed that Satan prevailed over Eve by imp-ortunity.—N. Y. Herald, P. I. Has it been demon-strated?—Commercial Bulletin. Yes, it is the latest devil-opment.

BEECHER says that hades is a state rather than a place. He doesn't say what state, but "Go to Texas" has always been considered synonymous with that other profane injunction.

"WHAT is the meaning of the word tantalizing?" asked the teacher. "Please, marm," spoke up little Johnny Holcomb, "it means a circus procession passing the school-house and the scholars not allowed to look out."

AT THE MUSEUM.—"Several years are supposed to elapse between this act and the first, are there not?" "Yes." "Well, that girl has got on the same pair of stockings she was wearing years ago. She ought to be ashamed of herself."

WILLIAM PENN was a very honest man. He would not rob the Indians of their lands. Not a bit of it! He honorably gave them seven pounds of bread and some jackknives for the territory of Pennsylvania. Such honesty cannot but be rewarded.

THE most beautiful feature about the American system of baggage checking is found in the fact that the passenger is made to carry in his pocket a piece of railroad property that would otherwise share in the general destruction generated by the baggage-smasher.

MR. ALCOTT told the Concord Summer School of Philosophers that "Actuality is the Thingness of the Here." The information almost paralyzed them. For years they had been laboring under the misapprehension that the hereness of the actuality is the thing. But it is no such thing.

"WHEN I hav prepared a remarkably good sermon," said Rev. Mr. Gushwell, "it generally happens that I hav a very small congregation to listen to it." "What a memory you hav!" exclaimed Fogg, in tones of astonishment; "how long ag was it that you prepared that sermon, did you say?"

AT Chautauqua the other day a little girl was asked if she was a Methodist. "Oh, no!" she replied. "I am a Brethren, and my mother is a Brethren too." These were the United Brethren. At Montreal one of the Plymouth brethren was asked why they never spoke of the Plymouth sisters. "Oh!" was the answer, "the Brethren embrace the sisters."

WANTED—A compositor; one who uses neither tobacco nor rum. Thus reads an advertisment, and we'll bet our boots to a leaden greenback that that man's place was crowded with applicants, and that the passers-by thought there was a funeral there. The idea of a compositor drinking or chewing! Pretty soon they'll accuse editors and reporters of staying away from church.

AT a recent examination in a girls' school the question was put to a class of little ones, "Who makes the laws of our government?" "Congress," was the ready reply. "How is Congress divided?" was the next question. A little girl in the class raised her hand. "Well," said the examiner, "Miss Sallie, what do you say the answer is?" Instantly, with an air of confidence as well as triumph, the answer came, "Civilized, half-civilize d and savage."

A BIG, fat colored woman went to the Galveston chief of police and told him that her step-son had run away, and she wanted to know where he was. "It bodders me to know why he left. He had everything he needed to make him comfortable. I done all I could for him," she observed. "Has he any marks by which he may be recognized?" "Well, I don't reckon all de marks I made on him wid a bed-slat while de old man was holdin' him has faded out yet."

"IS that a yacht?" was asked of a long, gaunt codder who was lounging about the wharf, and we pointed to a steam vessel coming in. "No," was the reply. "Is that a yacht?" pointing to another sort of craft that might be a yacht. "No, that ain't no yot, nuther," was the answer. "Well, what is a yacht?" was the next inquiry. "Wot's a yot?" said the fisherman. "Well, you get any sort of craft you pleases, and fill her up with liquor and segyars, and git yer frens on board and hav a lively old time—and that's a yot."

THERE was a young lady named Cholmondeley,
Whom men thought exceedingly colmondeley;
But as she would speak
In nothing but Greek,
They sighed and looked at her dolmondeley.

There was an old noble in Leicester
Who passed himself off as a jeicester;
He stood on his head
Until his nose bled,
And then the whole town he would peicester.

AN ENGLISH IDEA OF THE ABORIGINALS.

Speaking of his visit to England last year, John T. Raymond recently said at a London dinner party, the lady he escorted to the table said to him in a very earnest voice:

"Mr. Raymond, are you really an American? You are not in the least like my idea of one!"

"I am an American, but not an aboriginal," responded he.

"An aboriginal! You mean an Indian. That reminds me to ask you if you hav much trouble with the Indians in New York?"

"No; we hav got them pretty well under there," he remarked.

"And are they—do they dress as you do?"

"Oh, yes; in New York city they are great snobs, but at Niagara Falls they run about in the simplicity of nothingness."

"How dreadful," murmured the lady; "and Dean Stanley wrote so glowingly of the place and never said a word about it."

Notes and Clippings.

It is extensivly believed at Constantinople that the ex-khedive covets the caliphate, or spiritual headship of Mussulmanism.

An insurance company lately declined to accept a risk on the life of a member of the Irish Property Defense League at any price.

Spurgeon says that London is getting to be the most heathenish city under the sun, and the necessity for evangelical work there is greater than ever.

Oh, the ripple of childish laughter,
And the touch of the velvety hands!
The charm of the little features,
And the wee feet to patter the sands!

These chasten the beautiful sunshine
That floods all the house with its light;
And the vanished shadows before it
Are recalled but as dreams of the night.

"Around-the-world D. M. Bennett" has reached Scotland, and attended church one Sunday. Not a street car nor other vehicle was running, nor a shop open.—Cloud County Blade.

The Rev. John Hemphill, of San Francisco, is being tried for heresy in upholding the views of Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, a cousin of Robert G. Ingersoll, who conducts three kindergarten schools in that city.

Last week Mr. D. M. Bennett, of America, who is looking remarkably well, called upon us. He will remain in England for a few weeks, and then he will proceed on his journey around the world.—Secular Review.

Methodism in Chicago is in an uproar in consequence of the Thomas heresy trial. It is said that three conspicuous clergymen of the Chicago Conference can be convicted on one or another of the charges sustained in the case of Dr. Thomas, and that prosecutions are to begin at once.

Samuel Cupples is a conspicuous Methodist in St. Louis, and the Christian Advocate accuses him of including playing-cards in the merchandise of his store. The editor has heard that some of the cards are "marked and fixed up for what are called brace games," but he cares nothing for that, because all cards are equally wicked in his sight.

"There are Christian families," says the examining committee of the Boston public library, in its last annual report, "in which the Old Testament is a forbidden book to the young." Well, it ought not to be in any well-regulated household, unless the head of the family is prepared to admit those books of which Anthony Comstock has at present the monopoly.

Mr. Darwin, replying to a letter asking him whether the report of mosquitoes being seen in England suggested to him that an exceptionally hot mouth developed the English gnat into the mosquito, said: "I am sorry I cannot answer your question. The Tipulidæ, or gnat family, is a very difficult one, and not well-known. No trustworthy evidence has been advanced of the introduction or appearance in this country of a new species, but it seems to me probable that some English species hav lately increased in number."

The remnant of the Salvation Army still left in Baltimore is laboring in the southern part of the city with an announced determination to "make Satan howl." The latest style of gathering advertised is a "Hallelujah, Blood, and Fire Experience Meeting." This was set down for Sunday afternoon last. In the evening these sanguinary evangelical braves made "An Attack upon the Devil and his Host." As to exactly how much they succeeded in "making Satan howl" the returns are not all in as yet. The exhortations at these meetings generally consist principally of ranting. Those who attend are chiefly the most ignorant.

Mr. Swinburne writes to a French newspaper of Trelawny's death that England has lost in him her "last republican and free-thinking patriarch." His old friend is gone, he says, at the great age of eighty-one, "to meet the friends and emulators of his errant and warlike youth, Shelley, Byron, and Canaris." It is declared, though, without further explanation, that in writing the Captain Sumph episode of "Pendennis," Thackeray had Trelawny in his mind.

Dr. Thomas, the popular Methodist divine whose trial begins at Chicago on Thursday of this week, is reported as saying that, while he hopes to be sustained and vindicated in his Liberal views, he does not believe that an adverse decision will injure him in the least in public estimation. This is equivalent to saying that a large proportion of the Methodist clergy hav as little faith in the doctrin of everlasting punishment as he has himself, and whether they hav or not is a matter of little consequence to him or the public. Evidently church trials for heresy are losing their ancient terrors.—Detroit Evening News.

A gentleman from Delaware county, who was well acquainted with tha late A. M. Paine, founder and for many years editor of the Delhi Gazette, in referring to the kindheartedness that endeared him to all with whom he associated, relates that he kept a bag of buckwheat in the office, out of which he, in the winter, fed the little birds that gathered in the trees in front of the office. And yet the rector of the church which he regularly attended, and to the support of which he liberally contributed while alive, refused to preach his funeral sermon because he was not a member of the church. The minister might with profit study the life and character of the man on whose remains he put this insult, and learn from them lessons of kindness and Christian charity which he has apparently failed to find in the teachings of the theologians.—Middletown Mercury.

D. M. Bennett, Esq., editor and proprietor of the New York Truth Seeker, has started on his tour around the world, the Liberals of the United States and Canada having contributed, individually, a five-dollar piece to defray the expenses. In some cases some Liberals hav contributed ten, twenty, and in one instance even a hundred dollars. Among the list of contributors are a number of Jewish-Americans, and in this is our friend Philip Cowen, of Petaluma, who is down for ten dollars. The total amount realized so far is about four thousand dollars. In return Mr. Bennett will giv two or three volumes, illustrated, of his travels in circumnavigating the earth. We wish the brave and distinguished editor a prosperous voyage. In his travels we hope he will not find such fanatical persecutors as Comstock, Benedict & Co., the "good Christians" who, on a flimsy pretext, had him incarcerated in the Albany Penitentiary some two years ago. Bon voyage, gallant spirit.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

The Free Church of Scotland is just now in great distress both as regards its home and its foreign policy. Scarcely has the noise of the Robertson-Smith controversy died away when a new form of strife has begun to develop itself. Since the middle of the sixth century the Western church has laid aside the practice of settling disputes by the arbitrament of the fist, but it has just been resumed in the Free church. Recently, at a church meeting in Glasgow, the congregation, with a view to settling a point of orher, proceeded to seize each other by the throat, and fought over the question for an hour or two, clergy, elders, deacons, communicants and catechumens, male and female, rushing indiscriminately at one another with cries and blows, and defying the efforts of a dozen or score of the police to calm the confusion. The Church Commission, who are the General Assembly en permanence, are endeavoring to dissuade the office-bearers and people from what they call this "unholy warfare." In the mean time a fresh trouble has broken out in Paris, where the International Electrical Exhibition is open every day in the week. The Commission, who lately extinguished, with some difficulty, the light of biblical criticism among themselvs, hav written to the Parisians requesting that the electric light may at least be put out on Sundays. It is feared in some quarters that if the Parisians return any answer it may merely be in the way of directing the attention of the commission to the beam figuring so prominently at present in their own eye.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The London Secular Review says: According to the decision of the judge at the Norfolk Assizes, a juror who has no religious belief is neither entitled to swear nor to affirm. Mr. R. A. Cooper, of Norwich, who is well known to many of our readers, having been summoned on the petty jury, said that he thought he had better affirm, as the oath could hav no influence on him, although it would not affect his verdict. Upon being asked if that was the ground of his religious belief, Mr. Cooper said it was not, as he had no religious belief. The judge then expressed his inability to allow Mr. Cooper either to swear or to affirm, adding that the statute would not permit him to do so. "The only ground," he said, "upon which I can allow you to affirm is that the taking of the oath is not in accordance with your religious belief." "I cannot say that," replied Mr. Cooper. "Then," said his lordship, "I cannot help you. I once brought a bill into the legislature which would probably hav met your case; but it was not passed, and it has not been introduced since. You had better leave the box." Mr. Cooper having inquired if he might leave the court, was told, "Yes; we shall not trouble you again." Such a state of things is really a greater hardship than many persons would imagin. It places the conscientious objector to the oath in a most invidious position, subjecting him at once to the uncharitable judgment and the ill-concealed dislike of those of his neighbors whose minds are influenced by theological prejudices, and who regard the Freethinker as a direct emissary of the devil. We hope that ere long nothing of this sort will attend judicial proceedings.

In Maranham, a province of the empire of Brazil, at a plantation of a Mr. S. Vieira, a well was being dug by the negroes. When they had dug down to the lower bed of the tertiary strata, they came upon some bones which appeared peculiar to them. They sent to the house for their master, who, upon seeing them, comprehended the importance of the discovery at such a depth. He immediately ordered the work stopped, and sent to the city of Maranham for Drs. Brandao, Sogner, Barhosa, and Jansen Peneira, who, after studying the subject, agreed that they were human bones in a fossil state. They repaired to the place, and after twenty-four hours' labor in excavating, succeeded in taking out a complete skeleton without the loss of the least particular. The skeleton is of colossal dimensions, measuring eight feet and three inches in hight. And what is more extraordinary is the prolongation of the dorsal spine more than twenty inches. If this skeleton does not belong to an individual who had such a deformity, then we hav the most brilliant confirmation of the doctrin of Darwin. What is necessary now is to continue the excavation and discover another skeleton, and at once the great scientific problem is solved. What the discovery has already absolutely solved is the existence of man before the tertiary epoch. To what nation, then, does this skeleton belong? Can it belong to any nation of the red men who inhabited South America at the time of its discovery? Or can it belong to any nation extinct before that epoch? All corroborate the latter hypothesis. Extensiv investigations will yet one day giv to humanity the solution of these problems. The whole skeleton has been brought to Major Polycarpo Pinheiro to be prepared for exhibition. It is to be sent to the museum at Rio de Janeiro, with a box of the clay in which it was buried, as a specimen.

CHAPTER XXI.

Since time immemorial no lawsuit had created a greater sensation than this, which was equally important through the terribleness of its nature, as well as through the social position of the persons acting therein. Ah, and the part that I was to act therein! No one knew the relation in which Madame Bertollon had been standing to me. No one fancied that I once had lain on the heart of this accused in the intoxication of the highest bliss. No one knew that her illegal affection for me had perhaps given to her hand the first direction toward mixing the poisoned cup.

All this was yet a secret; it was to remain a secret. Only if Menard's skill was threatening to be victorious, should also these last mines be exploded against him. When it became known in Montpellier that I was Bertollon's advocate, the victory was given in advance to my opponent. After sufficient examination and hearing of witnesses Menard and I were allowed to appear before the bar.

The powerful orator seemed merely to mock at me. He sheer despised to appear opposit a young man, who only a short time ago had been his pupil and now was about to make his masterpiece. He spoke, and spoke with such power that I myself was most deeply moved and almost won over to the cause of the prosecuted woman.

The suit had already lasted, through Menard's skill, half a year, where I had hoped to conquer in a few weeks. Menard was always accompanied from the court-house by the applause of the people, and I seemed to spend my powers merely to make his victories difficult in order to increase his laurels.

The beauty of the accused had won over to her party all young men of the city, and her former benevolence secured for her the people's poorer classes. I had not to fight Menard, I had to fight against the secret affection of innumerable bribed hearts, and to wrestle with the memory of virtues in which Madame Bertollon had shown herself.

The more meanwhile my cause sank, the higher arose my courage. An unusual power animated me. Menard himself began either to respect or fear me the further I drove him back from his first conquests. His party diminished the more he was compelled to acknowledge facts which he had placed in ambiguity and uncertainty. Soon I heard public praise. Soon I was surrounded by a small number of partisans. Soon I also was greeted by a stormy applause, the more Madame Bertollon appeared as a criminal and her beauty and her virtue became darkened by the memory of her black deed.

As pleasing as this burning incense was to me, it pleased me not so much as Clementine's silent approbation.

Madame Bertollon was a relativ of the family De Sonnes. When it became known that I would defend Bertollon's cause, Clementine stood sadly at her window. She often shook her head. She made a threatening motion to me. I believed to understand her and shugged my shoulders, and could not be dissuaded from fulfilling a duty that was so sacred to me.

As my name became more known and praised in Montpellier, she, too, became more friendly. Clementine seemed over my success to forget the relationship of Madame Bertollon. Ah! I saw myself loved by the angel whom I worshiped. No mortal was more blessed than I. For years our silent understanding had already lasted.

Yet I return to the unfortunate lawsuit, which now for the accused took the worst turn. Madame Bertollon could, as all facts and witnesses were united against her, do nothing further than persistently deny that she intended to poison her husband, although the appearances pronounced her guilty. I now insisted upon her being examined closer than heretofore why or to what purpose she had, a week before the deed, bought the poison? She gave evasiv answers, and fell during cross-examination into contradictions. One saw, without difficulty, that she avoided disclosing the reason. All entreaties of her relativs, all threats of her advocate, could not prevail upon her. This increased the suspicion. Menard conceded his cause lost, although he incessantly attested her innocence. The tribunal ordered a severer imprisonment, and threatened with the first degree of torture in order to force a confession.

Then Madame Bertollon undertook to defend her own cause before the court, in which Mr. Menard was so unfortunate. I saw therein nothing but a cunning device of Menard, who now wished to call to assistance the touching power of female beauty to assist his eloquence.

When she entered the hall a death-like silence ensued. Never was she more charming than at this moment. Her simple dress and the pallor of deep sorrow called sympathy and pity into every heart and tears into every eye.

Every one was silent. Every eye now turned away from her to me. I was to speak. But I could not. I was in an unspeakable confusion. She was the picture of suffering innocence. All the pleasant hours that I had enjoyed at her side awoke in my memory at her sight and surrounded my soul like weeping angels, and prayed for her, and whispered, "She is certainly guiltless."

Finally I collected myself. I declared that no one would be more gratified to be convinced of the innocence of the accused than her own husband and myself, his advocate. But for that reason would it be indispensable that she should turn away from her the strong suspicion, that she should make known the purpose for which she had procured the poison.

Madame Bertollon was very weak. She leaned on the arm of her advocate. She looked at me with a painful glance, out of which spoke love and grief. "O Alamontada," said she, with feeble voice, "and it must be you who insists upon it to learn my intentions with the poison? You? And here?" She remained silent for awhile, then raised herself suddenly, turned her pale face toward the judges, and with a bitter tone, which expressed the despair of her soul, she said: "Judges, you hav threatened me with the torture to force my confession. It is enough. I will end this suit. I am guilty. I had intended a murder with this poison. More you will never hear from me. Condemn me!"

She turned around and left the hall, and a death-like stillness followed her—a deep stupefaction everywhere.

Two days afterward the tribunal spoke the word, "Guilty!" over the wretched one.

CHAPTER XXII.

Mr. Bertollon had recovered long before. He was happier than usual. He jested again, as formerly, over my so-called virtue-enthusiasm; he loved me at that so tenderly that it only caused him grief when I so stubbornly stood by my principles. I on that account sometimes pleased him by becoming apparently of his opinion, and gave in to his favorit whim that everything on earth was merely play of convenience.

In the evening before the court day on which the sentence should be pronounced upon Madame Bertollon, I was with him. We were merry; about midnight we were still sitting behind the wine-glasses, and swore to each other in the maddest intoxication everlasting friends' fidelity until death.

"Listen, Colas," said he. "Dost thou know Clementine de Sonnes?"

I turned red. Wine and friendship tore from me the sacred secret. Bertollon laughed loudly and cried again and again: "But, little fool that thou art, with thy secret virtue, thou art cheated everywhere. Be at least once reasonable. Why hast thou not told me that long ago? She would be by this time thy betrothed. Well, thou shalt hav her. There is my hand. With prudence we subjugate the world; why not a girl, or a proud family? For I perceive already that Clementine would not giv thee the mitten."

I fell in ecstasy on my friend's neck. "Oh, if thou wert able to do that, Bertollon!—if thou couldst do that! Thou wouldst make me happy—thou wouldst make a god of me!"

"The better. For I need yet a divine assistance to another little plot. A girl like thy Clementine—she has a striking resemblance to her—one could take them for sisters—such a girl livs in Agde. You think, you fools, that I travel on account of the wholesome air or mercantil enterprises over to Agde. No, I love that girl—I love her beyond expression; so no woman has yet fascinated me. As soon as I am rid of my wife I shall ask for the hand of this Venus of Agde. Rome sells dispensations. But then, Mr. Colas, I would take leave to forbid thy entertainments with my future wife as thou hast done with my first one."

"How, Bertollon?" cried I, astonished; "thou wilt marry again?"

"Why otherwise? Look here; I thought at first thou wouldst play a true romance with my wife. I thought thou lovest her really, and then I would hav transferred her to thee, and we would hav agreed upon that. It would hav been just pleasing to me. Then it would not hav caused this hellish scandal, and, with the poison, it came near going ill with me."

But how then, Bertollon; I do not understand thee?"

"Well, I must tell thee, thou little fool, when I, in the absence of my wife in the evenings, secretly went through her things—only laugh; thou seest I had not trusted the virtue of you two so entirely either—I thought that you would be writing love-letters, classical and real ones. And the rascal, lank Jack, just coming down the stairs, saw me sneak out of my wife's room as I had played her the mad joke. But the stupid mole shot by me and saluted reverentially."

"What joke, then? Thou oddly mixest thy jests. Drink, thou shalt liv!"

"And thou, also, Colas. Thou hast acted thy part well—art a precious fellow. I bet thou wouldst not hav held thy speech against my wife before the tribunal half as well if thou hadst known that I myself had put the poison—to be sure but little—into the essence."

"No, certainly not, dear Bertollon."

"Well, now, on just that account it was smart in me not to tell it to thee before. Now it can no longer do harm."

"Thou hast been no such a fool as to want to poison thyself?"

"Well, I knew already that the thing could not be so dangerous to me. I was only astonished to find poison in the possession of my wife. She had written it upon the box. But what thinkest thou that she may hav wanted the stuff for?"

"That even is a riddle."

"But cunning it was. Not so, Colas. Well, on the following morning I pretended an attack of dizziness, had sent word about it to my wife, who, after her custom, brought to me the essence herself. The physician also was ordered, so it was possible to giv directly an antidote to the poison. But I had put in only a very minute portion."

"But, Bertollon, what dost thou talk? Then thy wife is really innocent?"

"That is just the fun in the thing, and thou hast talked thy throat sore for nothing at all. But just drink, that heals up again. That was a bold stroke in me, wasn't it? My wife must think that she is fairly bewitched, for she does not know that I hav for all her cases the best pick-lock."

"But——" said I, and terror made me suddenly sober.

"But beware that no soul finds out a thing about this. Thou, Colas, art my only confidant, seest thou, and it might have terminated ill in spite of all. In the hurry I knocked a flask of red wine over in the medicin case, and forgot to place it upright again. In short and in reality, Colas, I am happy. Thou also shalt be so. I swear to thee that on the day on which I celebrate my wedding with Julia thou shalt also celebrate thine with Clementine. But what aileth thee? Upon my soul thou art fainting. Here, take this water; champagne never agreeth with thee."

He laid one arm around me while he handed me the glass. Shuddering, I pushed him back. I was stupefied by that which I had heard."

"Go to sleep," said he.

I left him. Laughing, he staggered after me.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

CHAPTER II.

CONCERNING MOSES.

Was there ever a Moses? Everything concerning him, from his birth to his death, is so fabulous that he seems as mythical as the enchanter Merlin. If such a person had really existed, if he had performed the incredible miracles which it is supposed he had performed in Egypt, would not some Egyptian author hav spoken of Moses? Even the Greeks, dabblers in the marvelous, hav not written a word concerning them. Flavius Josephus, who recited all passages of Egyptian authors touching upon the Jews, for the purpose of bringing his people into contempt, has not the effrontery to cite a single author who mentions the miracles of Moses. Does not this universal silence indicate very strongly that Moses is a myth?

Notwithstanding the little I hav studied of the habits and customs of the ancients, I know that the old Arabs were the inventors of many fables which hav been from time immemorial known among all other peoples. They conceived the history of Bacchus, which is supposed to hav been known long before the time when Moses appeared unto the Jews. Bacchus, or Bach, was born in Arabia, and wrote his laws upon two tables of stone, which were called Misem. This name somewhat resembles that of Moses. Having delivered from a rock he acquired the name of Misem, which means "deliverer of water." He had a wand with which he performed miracles and which changed itself into a serpent at his will. This same Misem passed over the Red Sea with dry feet, and at the head of his army. He separated the waters of the Orontus from the waters of the Hydaspus, and held them suspended upon the right and left. A column of fire shone over his army at night. The ancient Orphic verses which were chanted in Bacchanalian orgies helped to make these rites celebrated. This fable was so ancient that the fathers of the church believed that Misem and Bacchus were the same as Noah.*

*It may be necessary to observe that Bacchus was known in Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Etruscia a long time before any other nation had ever spoken of Moses, Noah, or any of his descendants. All that which we only find in the writings of the Jews from Adam to David was unknown to

Is it not very probable that the Jews adopted that fable and then wrote about it when they commenced to acquire a knowledge of letters under their kings? The marvelous was as necessary to them as it was to other peoples, but they were certainly not the inventors of these myths. There was no petty nation so coarse as the Jews. All their dreams were plagiarisms, and all their ceremonies were evidently in imitation of the Phœnician, Syrian, and Egyptian ceremonies.

That which they added to these fables appears so coarse and so revoltingly absurd that it only excites indignation and pity. In what foolish romance would a person be permitted to say that a man by a blow of a wand and in the name of an unknown God changed water to blood, while magicians did the same in the name of their god? The only thing in which Moses was superior to the sorcerers of the king was that he brought on the plague of the lice, which the other sorcerers were unable to do. A great prince has said that the Jews in making lice knew more than all the magicians of the world.

Why did an angel of the Lord kill all the animals of Egypt? And how was it that the king of Egypt was able to collect a body of cavalry after such an occurrence? How could cavalry travel on the bottom of the Red Sea?

How could this same angel of the Lord cut off the heads of all the eldest-born of the Egyptian families in one night? That would hav been good at the time when Moses could hav seized upon that beautiful country instead of cowardly fleeing with two or three million people, among whom, it is said, there were six hundred and thirty thousand fighting men. This is an immense crowd with which to flee from the cadets of Egyptian families whom only an angel was able to ravage.

This horde wanders in deserts where there is no water to be found. In order to help on this amazing expedition, God divides the waters of the sea right and left into two mountains. After saving them from the dangers of the passage of the sea he allows his favorit people to die of hunger and thirst.

All the rest of the history of Moses is equally absurd and barbarous. The quails, the manna, the interviews of Moses and God, twenty-three thousand of the followers of Moses slaughtered at his command by the priests, twenty-four thousand massacred upon another occasion, six hundred and thirty thousand warriors left in a desert where before there had never been two thousand—all these tales and many others seem, most assuredly, the hight of extravagance.

Some one has said that Orlando Furioso and Don Quixote are books as sober as geometries compared to the books of Jewish histories.* Were there anything true or natural in the fables of Moses we could then possibly believe that such a person existed.

Some people hav the effrontery to say that the feast of the Passover proves the passage over the Red Sea. We owe thanks to the Jewish God for that feast, and also for his goodness in slaughtering all the eldest sons of the Egyptians. Some people still insist that there is nothing more divine than that pious and divine butchery!

"Can any one conceive," said that orator but illogical reasoner Abaddie,† "that Moses would hav published his well-known memorials, in the event that they would hav been perceived to be false by six hundred thousand witnesses?"

Poor man! You should hav said "two million" instead of six hundred thousand witnesses, because six hundred and thirty thousand men predicate the existence of more than two million people. You say that Moses read the Pentateuch to more than two or three million Jews. You believe that some one of these two or three million people would hav contradicted Moses if there had been found any error in the Pentateuch, and that person would hav very probably inserted his criticism in the journals of the day! I hav nothing further to say to this absurdity, unless it is that all the people should hav signed the Pentateuch as witnesses, and that Monsieur Abaddie should hav seen their signatures!

You believe that the temples and rites instituted in honor of Bacchus, Hercules, and Perseus clearly prove that Perseus, Hercules, and Bacchus were the sons of Jupiter, and that the Temple of Castor and Pollux in Rome demonstrated that Castor and Pollux had fought for the Romans! This amounts to the absurdity that what we supposed to be has always really existed. The controversalists, for the arguments upon their cause (the most important to humanity) are indebted to Lady Blackacre* who did not dare to trust them to the public attending common plays. That which the fools hav written imbecils comment upon, and that which rogues teach we make the children learn by heart. We call the sage a blasphemer because he is indignant and even irritated with the most abominable stuff that has ever dishonored the human species.

the eastern and western nations. The chronology and the fables of that miserable tribe of Jews resembled the fables of other nations far more than they differed from them. The Jewish authors did not work very diligently, for they plagiarized from all their neighbors, and failed to disguise their petty larcenies. Instance the fable concerning Moses, which they had borrowed from the stories about Bacchus; and their story of Sampson taken from the fable of Hercules; and their story of the daughter of Jephtha like that of Iphegenia. Even the tale of Lot is an imitation of Eurydice, etc. [Note by Voltaire, 1771.]

Eusebius has preserved the preciousfragments of Sanchoniathon, who lived before Moses. Sanchoniathon did not speak of the Jews. Had there been any truth in the book of Genesis he certainly would hav said something about it. Eusebius would not hav failed to make such passages known. The Phœnician Sanchoniathon had nothing to say of it; therefore the Jews did not exist in his time, as a body, and the fables of Genesis had not then been invented. [1710].

* The cure Mesher compared the Pentateuch to Don Quixote.

† Abaddie [1657-1727] was the author of "The Truth of the Christian Religion," and of a work upon the divinity of Christ.

* Lady Blackacre is an extremely pleasant character in the comedy "Plaindealer" by Wycherly. Voltaire wrote an imitation of this play called "The Prude" [1767].

Our Infamous.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: While reading the copious extracts from Parton's "Life of Voltaire," and the comments thereon by Bro. Wakeman, I hav felt how much the cause of truth is indebted to these brave and able friends for the consecration of their talents to so laudable and much needed a work, and my only regret arises from the fact that so many who desire will be unable to purchase Mr. Parton's work.

Of this truth, however, we may rest assured, that Mr. Parton has brought forth from the vile heap of priestly rubbish and base misrepresentation to the light of day and the perception of the honest thinking and truth-loving mind one of the grandest and most beautiful characters in history.

From henceforth this advanced thinker, indomitable worker, and sublime philanthropist shall be truthfully known for what he taught, said, and did, and his spirit of true devotion, and self-abnegation for the good of his kind, will inspire this and coming generations to emulate his glorious example.

Will it be ever thus that the slow progress of our race shall be written in blood? That its true saviors must be crucified, and their names and fame buried beneath mountains of prejudice and falsification ere the world perceives their value and their grandeur?

Thus far the lines of history run parallel; 'tis ever the black lines of prejudice, and the red ones of persecution and blood, traced by the priesthood and lawgivers for the people to execute. It is the untaught, or rather wrong-taught, masses crucifying their own deliverers.

Well indeed do the self-crowned kings of the "Infamous" understand that a very free people would not submit to their dictation, and that unfettered reason would soon discover the cause of mental debasement and its proper remedy.

It has well been said that "ignorance is the evil and knowledge the remedy," and there is no fact more patent than this, that the people never injure those they esteem their friends.

The people always mean well, and 'tis only when a priesthood, jealous of the truth, or a politician more anxious for success than for right, misleads the people by their misrepresentations and appeals that errors or great wrongs are committed by the populace.

Our "Infamous" is ubiquitous. No human being, fireside, or business is entirely free from its omnipotent espionage. It is Janus-faced and brazen-faced. It hesitates not to brand with all the infamy it dare any and every loyal soul to truth and justice that calls in question its right to dominate over the human mind.

We need not go abroad to note its despotic machinations and its Jesuitical deceit and subterfuge. The "order of the Jesuit" is not confined to the church of Rome. Protestantism, that violates the cardinal element of its own origin and growth, discounts the "mother church" in its persistent and impudent workers who form a large percentage of the Young Men's Christian Association. You will find them everywhere; they imagin that they hav a divine right to press upon you unasked their sickening cant and obscene literature. They are God's especial favorits; their prayers are essential to the salvation and perpetuation of our liberties, and the only thing to make our republic safe beyond the peradventure of a doubt is to write in and on the national Constitution that this is a Christian country.

It is true that we hav no bastile like they had in France in the days of the "Ferney" philosopher, that the lives of reformers are more safe from Christian hate than in the days of Huss, Savonarola, and Servetus, but we hav our penitentiaries, and the Liberal ranks hav and are still furnishing many victims to appease the wrath of the "Infamous" that reigns to day and that does not hesitate to pay a large salary to one of its chief executioners, Anthony Comstock.

The most pitiable spectacle, and the one to be most deplored, is the cowardly silence of those who clearly perceive this violation of mental liberty, and yet who through fear of losing a little social caste, or suffering some in the way of trade, stifle their convictions, their sense of duty, and tacitly by their silence acquiesce in priestly and pot-house rule.

I do not think the priesthood as a whole mean to work injury to their flocks; the folly is ingrained that by some sort of spiritual "hocus-pocus" they hav been set over the people to keep them from doing themselvs harm. It seems an utter impossibility to convince any man or party that thinks he or they are born leaders that the people are ever quite ready for all truth they are capable of imparting. They seem to think that the minds of the uncultured masses are a kind of embryo powder magazine, and if entrusted with all the (little) truth priests and politicians are capable of imparting they would explode into all forms of irreligion and lawlessness.

These careful souls forget that the basic elements of equity and good practical sense rests with the people, and that all that is valuable is saved from ruin by the common mind, whether it be from social, political, or religious revolution.

So true is this human progress indebted in part to the innate honesty of the great uncultured mass of the race that reformers hav ever understood that wherever and whenever they could get at the common people a reasonable success was assured.

What makes ecclesiasticism and statecraft united so infamous is their disposition to fetter the human mind and make it subservient to their lust for power and rule, and still further the effort on the part of the ecclesiastics to destroy by any means within their reach all who question their positions or hav courage to think for themselvs.

Our boasted liberty is a farce so long as this despotism is allowed to exist. By what right does this pretended divine monopoly rob the people of its just share of taxation? They reverse every principle of justice. Taxation without representation was declared a positiv political wrong. What is excessiv representation without taxation?

To the many who sail with the tide the great overshadowing evil is not clearly perceived, but once let a man be as honest to criticise religious opinions as he is to call in question old methods in labor or mechanics, and he will soon discover the abominations of the mental slavery that fetters the human mind by its invisible chains.

We do not hesitate to accept any improvement or supposed one in the realm of physical industry, and why should not the same rule exist in the domain of thought?

Who and what are these would-be spiritual and mental dictators? Hav they a patent from the "Lord of hosts" to determin what we may or may not believe? And who among us proposes to longer submit to their arbitrary rule?

As long as friends of Liberal thought fight the battles of justice and toleration, they will march steadily on to sure and permanent victory. In an open contest with theologians that seek exemption from taxation for church property, and who are determined to impose their peculiar notions and literature into our schools, we hav no fear. All we ask is for them to require no special privileges at our expense for their pet theories and unreasonable assumptions.

We must make this country at least as free from this ecclesiastical infamy as our Revolutionary fathers made the nation free from the power of England. We must place our "Infamous" on the defensiv. We must demand the reasons for their tyranny and misrule. We mean to say to these self-styled lords, What good does the use of the holy James's (old version) Bible do in our public schools? Why should Catholics and Liberals submit to this waste of time, expense, and insult to their rights? Why tax us for chaplains in the army, navy, and halls of legislation? Why everlastingly stand in the way to block every advance step in science? And why in the name of all that is equitable and humane be always on the alert to ferret out and expose to the public odium of religious dupes each and every one that seeks the accomplishment of the best liberty and happiness of mankind?

We must not be satisfied in the simple proclamation of our advanced ideas, but must attack the enemy along the whole line and make them come out from their defenses to the open field.

Those of us who still believe it possible to maintain the best spirit of what we think constitutes a natural and rational religion need not be afraid to take part in the hottest of the conflict. If religion has any value it will work for human liberty. Its preservation depends entirely on the salvation of humanity from every influence that retards its onward march to the largest possible culture and development of the entire human being.

To me the most sacred thing is man, male and female. The gods will take care of themselvs. My duty is to my race. All that concerns them concerns me. In their liberty I rejoice; in their slavery my own soul is fettered. Priests and kings are in principle our common enemies. The greatest of all divinities is the rights and liberties of the people, and all that stands in opposition is "The Infamous."

The Nation's Calamity.

President Garfield is dead. Last Monday he passed into the last hours of his long struggle with death, and when the night had come he died.

He is the second President who has been slain by assassination. But Lincoln was killed in the heat of passion stirred up by civil war, while Garfield was shot by cold-blooded fanaticism, wrought upon by political feeling. Garfield was shot by religion, and when Guiteau is arraigned at the bar of justice religion should stand up with him. He was, he says, inspired by God to shoot the President. Freeman was inspired by God to murder his child. Jephthah was inspired by God to slay his daughter. Abraham was inspired by God to sacrifice his son. All through the ages men hav been inspired by God to take human life. Guiteau had illustrious examples. Christianity has always been cruel. Its foundation is upon innocent blood. Had the President's assassin never had a Bible, had he never been taught the gospel of blood, had he never "communed with God," had he never been instructed in Christianity, Garfield would be alive to-day. He is the victim of the church, a sacrifice to the Moloch of superstition.

The prayers that were recently made in behalf of our chief magistrate were heartfelt and true, yet they were without avail. Medical science prolonged his life eighty days, but either there is no God to hear and answer prayer, or else he wished an innocent life to ebb away by foul assassination. What a mockery of divine justice! What a lesson is taught the people of this country! There was no omnipotent shield to stand between a life dear to every one and the religious fanatic's bullet, and there was no omnipotent power to answer the voice of beseeching millions. Natural law controled everything.

And yet in the face of all this, in the face of the fact that Guiteau says he was told by the Lord to shoot, in the face of the fact that he has spent his time in his cell upon his knees or reading the Bible, in the face of all his pious utterances, some religious mountebanks, like J. P. Newman, hav laid the President's death at tbe door of Infidelity. Such charges are monstrous, and the fact that ministers can make them only shows how religion has degraded their manhood and robbed them of the last particle of honor and self-respect. Would that Guiteau had been an Infidel, for then the Bible would hav had no influence over him to make him commit the cruel deed!

Over the wasted form there will no doubt be held religious services. But what a mockery! Grief cannot dry its eyes by kneeling at the fountain from which its tears are flowing. How can the stricken widow derive consolation from the religion that deprived her of her husband? It seems to us that in this case, if in no other, the church should cover itself with mourning for its own sin instead of offering words which are such a palpable mockery. And the lesson to be drawn is that we hav still the old murderous spirit of Christianity in our zealous fanatics that must be driven out ere the life of any man is safe.

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who have sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books besides. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about next January for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There hav been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and, so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who have read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. We hav read whole pages of glowing descriptions of the Glen and Lakes of Killarney, but could never form an idea of how they looked till Mr. Bennett told us in last TRUTH SEEKER. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early workers, but if that is divine justice poor fallible human beings cannot be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine a book as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back.

Post-Office Tyranny.

The final decision in the case of Dr. Foote's Health Monthly has been reached by the post-office authorities, and Dr. Foote has been deprived of the use of the mail to send his paper except by paying one cent on each copy. The decision was given by one Freeman, who is employed somewhere around the office at Washington, and shows very plainly that it is written by a little man who wants to appear big. He swells up with his judicial importance to a very large size, and lays down his propositions, which he says are settled beyond dispute. They may be so far as he is concerned, but we fancy the people will go on disputing the right of any petty post-office clerk to deprive them of a newspaper which they want, for a cent a copy means ruin to any publisher unless he can evade it, as Dr. Foote has done by mailing his paper from Canada, where the post-office officials do not arrogate to themselvs the functions of judge and executioner. One objection to Dr. Foote's paper—noted by the oracular individual who sits in judgment on radical journals in the post-office—was that he sent out large numbers of sample copies; but no notice is taken of the fact that right in Washington a firm solicits advertisments on the ground that it sends out one hundred sample copies per month. In view of this, and the well-known cupidity of government officials, the question might be asked as to how much is paid for the privilege. We would also like to know why the post-office lets Harper and his Franklin Square Library through at pound rates, when the publications are books, to send which we hav to put on stamps? Is it because the Republican officials want the support of Harper's Weekly? And what right hav they to use the people's mail service to pay for services rendered to them personally? There is a good deal of favoritism and tyranny exercised by all our government officials, and none are more brazen and outrageous than the little almightys who distribute our mail.

It is a source of joy that in having his paper mailed from Canada Dr. Foote has found a way of circumventing the would-be despots. Now the post-office has to carry the Health Monthly just the same, and it does not get its two cents a pound, as it formerly did. It is to be hoped that Canada will never be blessed with such bullying officers as this country is.

All communications for the Health Monthly should be sent, as before, to New York.

Comstock Attacks the Wrong Man.

Once again has the sneak been poking his officious nose into the business of vastly better men than himself, and this time he has got it tweaked. The proprietor of "Wilsonia" is a man of energy and does not propose to hav his business broken up by Comstock and his soap-fat backer.

Last week Mr. Wilson began to receive calls from patients, each showing him a circular letter reading thus:

THE NEW YORK SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE, 150 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK, Sept., 10, 1881.

DEAR SIR; Several complaints of a very startling character hav come to me from persons who hav been sick and afflicted, and who claim to hav been outrageously swindled and imposed upon by one William Wilson, of 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, by an arrangement called "Wilsonia."

Among the representativ references published in a pamphlet I find your name.

I find that the right name of this man is William Cotter Wilson, and that a few years ago he was employed in Eighth street as a poor cabinetmaker, and he did business in and around what is known as Science Hall, and that some friends helped him to go to England about four years ago. He afterwards returned to this country.

As you are published by him as his reference, will you kindly state to me if he has your permission and authority to so publish, and inform me of the merits of this article which he so loudly advertises? By so doing you will render great assistance in a very important investigation now being made. Any information you may hav will be gratefully received.

With considerations of highest esteem, I remain very truly,
ANTHONY COMSTOCK, Secretary.

To which Mr. Wilson replied as follows:

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ., Dear Sir: I was surprised this morning to find in my consulting rooms many of my former patients, each bringing me a circular letter received from you, a copy of which is inclosed herewith. With this each handed me a copy of their replies to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon. I would take it as a favor if you would giv me the names of the informants to whom you refer. They are amenable to prosecution, and it may become my duty to institute proceedings against them. It will giv me pleasure to afford you convincing proof of my position, and of the nature and benefit of my appliances as a curativ agent. I believe my services in this respect will be found to be such as to commend me to universal approval as a public benefactor. Mention is made in your letter in reference to my name. Allow me to refer you to the Brooklyn directory, where you will find an advertisment of mine and my name and address in full.

I hav inclosed one of my blank checks (not for use). You will see my name printed on the end. As to my having been a cabinet maker, upon that fact I build my glory; in not only having earned an honest livlihood, but to hav won the respect of all honest men with whom I hav come in contact, until to-day I stand in the proud position, as the inventor of a system destined to overthrow the pernicious practice of drugging humanity. I understand most fully the penalties I hav to bear for having dared to teach medical men their business. Do you not know that all great inventions and improvements ever emanate from persons whose walk in life has been totally distinct from that in which such inventions were likely to spring? My discovery of the real nature of nerve fluid and blood composition must revolutionize the practice of medicin. That being the case, hav I not cause to be proud of once having been a cabinetmaker? If a rail-splitter may become a President, and our now President not being ashamed of having once conducted a barge, why should William Wilson be ashamed of having been a cabinetmaker?

Hoping that you may pay a visit to my establishment, and there see for yourself the result of my labor, I remain respectfully yours,
WILLIAM WILSON.

P. S.—I intend to publish all letters sent to me, being copies of those sent to you, and will take it a favor if you will forward all letters sent you for or against me.

Any one who knows the methods of Comstock will not be at a loss to know what he is trying to do in sending out this circular. His aim was to get some information upon which he could go to Washington and get Mr. Wilson's mail stopped upon the ground of fraud. Among the many thousands whom Mr. Wilson has supplied with his garments, there may be a few disaffected ones. Mr. Wilson himself says that "my difficulty is that many persons will become rotten with disease, will swallow medicin enough to float a steamship, and rub in liniments and ointments enough to tan the skin, till it becomes like the sail of a ship, and then, hearing of my marvelous cures, will expect, on putting on my goods, to jump into new life in two or three months. This, in most cases, is an impossibility, and those perhaps, governed by such expectations, had better not waste their time or my own in calling upon me." If Comstock could hav found one of these he would hav been happy. He has found out that Mr. Wilson is a Liberal Spiritualist, that he is a warm friend of Mr. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that was reason enough for him to attack "Wilsonia." Added to this is the fact that he, like Dr. Foote, has incurred the displeasure of the "regular" M.D.'s by curing people by the use of remedies not down in the "regular" books nor used by "regular" physicians, who are as bigoted in their way as the "regular" orthodox churches. Comstock is the tool of orthodox bigotry in matters of medicin or religion, and he may hav been instigated in his annoyance of Mr. Wilson by the "regular" physicians, who see in the "Wilsonia" the overthrow of their drugging system.

Mr. Wilson deemed himself libeled by Comstock's insolent circulars, and immediately engaged counsel and instituted a civil and criminal libel suit against the sneak, upon the latter of which he swore out a warrant for his arrest. Two policemen were detailed to capture Anthony, but he could not be found. Mr. Wilson then advertised a hundred dollars reward. Thursday afternoon at three o'clock he and two witnesses went to Comstock's office, where he was informed by three clerks that Anthony was not in, and would not be in till "next week." Yet Friday morning he received a letter from Comstock dated Thursday and post-marked 2 A. M. Friday, showing that it was mailed Thursday after midnight, and which proves conclusivly that Comstock was in when Mr. Wilson called, and that his clerks lied to him. Friday Anthony was found by the policemen and taken before Justice Solon B. Smith. Comstock waved examination, and was held to await the action of the grand jury. The following is a copy of the commitment:

"It appearing to me by the within depositions and statements that the crime therein mentioned has been committed and that there is sufficient cause to believe the within-named Anthony Comstock guilty thereof, I order that he be held to answer and to be admitted to bail in the sum of $500 and be committed to the care of the warden or keeper of the city prison of the city of New York until he giv such bail. SOLON B. SMITH, Police Justice.

"Dated September 16, 1881."

Samuel Colgate went his bail. He fathers all of Comstock's operations, and stands ready with his wealth to back him in all his questionable transactions. They are a precious pair of Christians whom the country would be better off without. We trust Mr. Wilson will not slacken in his prosecution of Comstock, but will giv him his just deserts.

Nihilism in Russia

Was the subject of a very interesting and instructiv lecture before the Liberal Club last Friday night. The lecturer, Mr. William Frey, is a Russian, and was for many years an officer in the service of the Russian government, and though not himself a Nihilist is yet in full sympathy with the terrible wrongs and sufferings by the Russian people that make Nihilism possible if not inevitable.

The lecturer reviewed the history of Russia under the government of Nicholas and Alexander II., and enumerated the wrongs of the people that gave rise to the Nihilistic party. He asserted that the much vaunted reforms of the late emperor, especially the emancipation of the serfs, were shams; that it was only a substitution of a hated system of "landlordism," and had to be forced on the people by the bayonets and bullets of the soldiery. He regarded the assassination of the czar as an act of desperation on the part of an outraged and despairing people; he regarded it as unwise, but would not say that it was not a just retribution for his (the czar's) political crimes against the people; that averse as he (the lecturer) was to destructiv methods, he would hav become a Nihilist had he remained in the country, and to escape which was one of the principal reasons of leaving the imperial service and emigrating to this country.

The lecturer's recital of the atrocities that led to the assassination of the czar and other high officials, especially those in which women were the instruments of the people's vengeance, as also the history of the man who invented the bombs by which the late emperor was slain, were listened to with breathless interest by the audience.

He completely refuted the stock argument of the conservativ press in relation to the gratitude due the government of the late czar from the American people for sending its fleet to our shores during the late rebellion to keep England in check. He showed how that act was a stroke of policy in its own behalf, and had no reference to American politics.

The facts briefly were these: Russia was then on the point of a rupture with England and France on account of the remonstrance of their journals against the cruel policy or Russia in Poland. To save her fleet from destruction in case of a rupture it was necessary to get it out of the Baltic Sea into the Atlantic, where, in case of war with those nations, it could hav the protection of the neutral ports of a powerful and friendly nation.

The lecturer spoke of the possibility of the extradition of Hartmann as an act which no government, much less that of the United States, could do and retain its integrity and the respect of the civilized world. "At present," said the speaker, "the Nihilists are the true representativs of the Russian people, and unless Alexander takes warning there will yet be a terrible explosion of the Russian people. We may shudder at the coming disaster, but none of us must blame the Nihilists. When the boiler explodes, ruining property and killing men, nobody blames the steam for being condensed beyond the endurance of the boiler. If you wish to blame anybody, blame the man who attends to the machinery."

As Others Saw Us at the Hornellsville Convention.

We are obliged to Reuben Dailey for this in the Seymour Times:

"Among those whom I met and became personally acquainted with was Eugene Macdonald, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Mr. Bennett's absence. He is a quiet, modest-looking young man, and is equally modest in action and manners. What little intercourse I had with Mr. Macdonald was of the pleasantest nature. His wife and child were present. Mrs. Macdonald delighted the convention by her fine singing."

The "better half" and baby are equally obliged to S. P. Putnam for the following in the Boston Investigator:

"Eugene Macdonald, the representativ of friend Bennett of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, was also present, and with him his 'better half,' plus the baby. It was a nice Liberal trinity. We were under great obligations to Mrs. Macdonald for her beautiful singing. She has a sweet and powerful voice, and it gave melodious expression to the spirit of the hour."

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this conntry—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

MR. UNDERWOOD, who has had temporary charge of the Index, seems determined the paper shall not lose its reputation as a chronic growler at Liberals. He dislikes to see the New York Freethinkers' Association affiliate with the National Liberal League, and devotes two columns to an attempt to show that the League is a very bad body of men. The animus is apparent. He dislikes to see two such powerful bodies unite for work, for he is afraid they will do something practical to curtail Christianity, which is the last thing in the world the Boston sentimentalists want done.

W. F. JAMIESON has postponed his visit to Eaton Rapids, Evart, and Mancelona, Mich., for a few weeks, and is lecturing evenings and Sundays in southern Michigan and northern Indiana. Address for lectures, Albion, Mich.

H. L. GREEN will lecture at Belmont, N. Y., on Sunday, the 24th inst. Subject, "The Religion of Deed, vs. the Religion of Creed."

New Publications.

The contents of the North American Review for October cannot fail to arrest the attention of all readers. Every one of the topics discussed is of the highest present interest, and nearly all of the authors are eminent American statesmen, publicists, and litterateurs. Senator John T. Morgan, of Alabama, considers "Some Dangerous Questions," namely, certain emergencies arising in the administration of the United States government, for which adequate provision is not made in the Constitution or the laws. Among these questions, that of the succession to the Presidency in case of the inability of the elected incumbent holds a conspicuous place, and it is treated by the writer with much learning and in the most judicial temper. Prof. George P. Fisher, of Yale College, contributes a study of "The Elements of Puritanism." Senator George F. Edmnnds, of Vermont, defines the relations which exist between "The State and the Nation," replying to an article by the Hon. David Dudley Field that appeared in the May number. D. C. Gilman, President of John Hopkins University, writes of "The Idea of the University," drawing the line of distinction between the college and the university, and showing how the latter institution is the indispensable organ of a generous, liberal culture. A timely historical paper is that of Mr. Sydney Howard Gay, "Why Cornwallis was at Yorktown." Under the title, "Shall Two States Rule the Union?" the Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks discusses the perennial tariff question, which, he insists, is a subject not for politicians, but for economists, to be settled, not in the councils of politicians, but by a commission of manufacturers and business men. M. Désiré Charnay, in the ninth of his valuable archæological papers, sets forth the grand results of his researches among the "Ruined Cities of Central America." Finally, Col. H. B. Carrington, in an article on "Washington as a Strategist," proves conclusivly the title of Washington to be esteemed "first in war."

The Two Worlds. A Record and Exponent of Modern Spiritualism in its higher aspects. Published at 100 Nassau street, this city, by Eugene Crowell. A. E. Newton, editor.

Number 1 of this paper has reached us. It is a large-sized, four-page sheet, well printed, and with many articles in it interesting to Spiritualists. Although the editor and publisher know what hard work it is to start a new paper, especially one devoted to teaching Spiritualism, nevertheless they talk cheerfully of their prospects and are in no wise daunted by the fact that so many hav tried and failed. We wish them success.

The Spiritual Offering. Newton, Iowa. D. M. and N. P. Fox, editors and publishers.

This journal has been changed from a monthly to an eight-page weekly, and removed to Iowa. The West needs a decent Spiritual paper to take the place of the Chicago sheet, and we hope this one can keep its head above water. It is published very cheap, and ought to obtain a large circulation.

Some London Topics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Doubtless many of your readers hav perused with as great interest as myself an article in the North American Review for the past month on "The Christian Religion," by Col. Ingersoll, written in his usual forcible manner, and, as far as I can see, unanswerable, for the so-called reply by J. S. Black is quite wide of the mark, and does not attempt to combat any of the objections raised. Who Mr. Black is I do not know, never having before heard of him, but I presume he is one of the champions of orthodoxy in the states. He follows the usual tactics of his party, and mistakes abuse for argument, thinking that if he throws plenty of mud some of it is bound to stick. If he is the best man who can be put forward as defender of the faith, the church must be in a very poor state. It never was very strong in the matter of brains, and although the writer boasts that the best and wisest men for the past eighteen hundred years hav been amongst its members, he carefully abstains from informing us who they were. I think it will be found on examination that just the reverse is the case. There hav been plenty of writers and talkers in the church, but the great majority of them were mere windbags, and never wrote anything worth reading nor said anything worth hearing. They were and are utterly deficient in useful knowledge, totally ignorant of science, and destitute of reasoning capacity, but are masters of sophistry, mistaking it for logic, of which, as a rule, they know nothing.

They quarrel and fight amongst themselvs, each sect condemning the other to everlasting torment, and only combine to attack the common enemy. It is amusing the way they contradict themselvs and each other. At one time they will declare that what they call "the church of Christ" is gaining ground every day and everywhere, and directly after they will lament the fact that many are falling away and that the prince of this world is making rapid headway; and if you tax them with the inconsistency of the two opposit statements they set to work to profess to prove that they are both correct, and that the "apparent" contradiction is really the most perfect harmony.

Such people are past all argument, and nothing can be done with them. They must be left to die out, as they will do eventually. There will then be an end to them, and the world will be all the better.

At the present time, the movement now being agitated in the country for the abolition of the Puritanical observance of Sunday is the thorn in the flesh of the clergy. These "gentlemen in black" think the public house and the church or chapel are quite enough for all right-minded citizens, and no other amusements are necessary. Canon Birch, one of the queen's chaplains, said a short time back at a public meeting that one of the most unhappy features of the time was that in Manchester and other manufacturing towns there should be thousands ready on Sundays to listen to lectures of secularists, having for their subject the dethroning of the Christian faith from its position in the land.

There is not the least doubt as to the canon feeling bad about it, as if secularism spreads too fast, the national church will be speedily abolished, and these sinecurists and pluralists will hav to fall back on their savings or turn to an honest mode of gaining a livelihood, which would be a very difficult thing for them to do. After so many years of crooked dealing, honesty would be strange to them, and they would not get in the way of it easily.

It seems as though the Archbishop of Canterbury is not in favor with the Lord at the present time, as his prayer for fine weather has brought on an extra supply of rain, and the chances are that if he had left the matter alone the farmers might hav saved the harvest, as now, through his interference, it is nearly all spoiled. He ought to hav known that he was in disgrace with the authorities up above, but I suppose he did not want it to become generally known that such was the case, and thought that perhaps they might overlook it on this occasion to save his credit with his deluded followers. But of course he will not admit that this is the reason his prayers are not answered. He will say all the adverse weather is sent to punish the people for their sins and their falling away from the "true church," and that they must take it as a hint to quit backsliding and pay up all arrears of tithes and pew rents, and when this is all done to the satisfaction of the priests things will come straight again.

You will be glad to hear that Mr. Bradlaugh is so far restored to health that he is now able to resume his lecturing engagements. It is generally thought that no obstacle will be put in the way of his taking his seat when Parliament again meets for business, and if there is any objection made the government will step in to his assistance. He will scarcely submit to the same treatment he has already experienced, and if his opponents still persist in keeping him out of his constitutional rights an appeal to force will be the only remedy left.

I hav had the pleasure of conversing several times with Mr. D. M. Bennett since his arrival here, and am glad to find he is looking well and hearty, and trust his trip will be an enjoyable one. All his time is fully taken up, and whenever I hav called upon him he was busy writing. I hav not once caught him loafing, but if I do will not fail to report him. I think, judging by present appearances, it bids fair for his friends having their money's worth in his weekly letters. Believe me,

Sincerely and fraternally yours, J. D.

Book Notice.

JOHN'S WAY. A Domestic Radical Story. By Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker. Author of "The Darwins," "Studying the Bible," etc. D. M. Bennett, publisher, New York. Price, 15 cents.

In this little volume, Mrs. Slenker has "truth in a nutshell." The characters which she has portrayed certainly exist in every-day life. The creeds and dogmas which now envelop such a large portion of mankind, as represented and preached by thousands of the clergy, are replied to in a sarcastic and argumentativ manner. The evolution from Christianity to Freethought, it being what many hav passed through, is perfect to life. Instead of impossible things, such as taught by Bible students as eminating from the God of heaven, or the light, trashy improbable stories the country is being flooded with, we hav in "John's Way" a story of real life, clothed in beautiful and chaste language.

Young people should send for this little story. Old folks should buy it and giv it to some chain-bound friend, that it may be the means of freeing them from old theology. The Christian people distribute their publications throughout the world; should Liberals remain silent and let that which they are satisfied is false be forced upon the people without trying to counteract the influence?

We shall make some extracts from this truly valuable little book in the near future.—Monthly Reiew.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Six Days in Ireland.—Concluded.

Immediately after breakfast we chartered a jaunting-car to take us five miles to Blarney and the old castle. The drive, both going and coming, was most interesting and lovely, being in the valley of the river Lee, a very fine stream, and numerous beautiful residences and lovely homes being scattered along in the most charming manner. There is nothing special to be said about the village of Blarney, though nice and neat enough in its way. The castle is the main attraction, which is some quarter of a mile from the village. It is the largest and tallest old castle I have seen in Ireland. The front of it is one hundred feet in hight, while the rear, where the ground is considerably lower, is one hundred and fifty feet high, with a watch-tower adjoining. It was built in the fifteenth century by the McCarthy family, who were once the terror of the semi-barbarians who inhabited this beautiful country. Under the castles are the horrible dungeons in which unfortunate prisoners were once confined; and as I groped around in their small, dark, damp recesses, not able to stand more than half erect, I could not help pitying the miserable wretches who were confined there, and was forced to admit that their fate was much worse than mine, My prison cell, three and a half by seven feet, was a palace compared with those miserable dungeons under Blarney Castle. Hard by are caves, or a single cave with two or three avenues or compartments, being low excavations under the rocks, where fifty or one hundred people could find refuge from a pursuing foe. Doubtless it was many times resorted to. The most noted thing about Blarney Castle is the Blarney Stone, the kissing of which is said to have such a remarkable effect as to make the one paying that devotion extremely complaisant, flattering, beguiling, glib, sweet, wheedling, and persuasive in his or her conversation. The belief in the wondrous powers of this stone probably grew out of some silly old fable, the same as other strong beliefs held by thousands and millions have grown out of other baseless fables and legends. The song which has achieved for itself and the groves of Blarney a widespread reputation was written as a burlesque upon some of those wordy ditties with which ignorant pedantry used to astonish village circles. It is in this style:

The groves of Blarney
They look so charming,
Down by the purling
Of sweet silent streams,
Being banked with posies
That spontaneous grow there,
Planted in order
By the sweet rock close.
'Tis there the daisy
And the sweet carnation,
The blooming pink.
And the rose so fair,
The daffy-down-dilly,
Likewise the lily,
All flowers that scent
The sweet fragrant air.

There is a stone there,
That whoever kisses,
Oh! he never misses
To grow eloquent.
'Tis he may clamber
To a lady's chamber,
Or become a member
Of Parliament.
A clever spouter
He'll sure turn out, or
An out-and-outer,
To be let alone;
Don't hope to hinder
Or to bewilder him,
Sure he's a pilgrim
From the Blarney Stone.

What is considered the original Blarney Stone is laid in the front wall of the castle, about eight or ten feet from the top, with two bars of iron coming from the top of the wall over it, thus being some ninety feet from the ground. The stone is perhaps three feet in length by ten in thickness. As may well be imagined, it requires a pretty dexterous man, even when upon the top of the castle, to let himself down by clinging to the bars of iron while he kisses the stone of wonderful powers, and then haul himself up back again. As hazardous as the feat must be, it is said to have been accomplished by some daring visitor to the castle. To prevent a repetition of the foolhardy exploit, another "real" Blarney Stone was provided and placed inside the castle, near the top of it, which has since been the Blarney Stone that has been kissed.

It is reported that a company of ladies and gentlemen once visited the castle, and one or two of the number kissed the Blarney Stone. A gentleman coming in about the time said he did not care to kiss the stone, but he was resolved to kiss the lady's lips that had kissed the stone. He had some difficulty in finding which lady to kiss. Finally one of the ladies said she had not kissed the stone, but had sat upon it. The man left on the first train.

I was not ambitious enough to try to get up to the first "original" Blarney Stone and kiss it; and as the door of the castle was locked, and the woman who had the key was not there, I could not get to the second "original" one, and I had to content myself by throwing up a kiss to the one in the high wall, without knowing whether it struck or not. If I am no more oily of speech, no more winning and persuasive, than I have heretofore been, I think it will be safe for you to conclude that my kisses did not strike.

What interested me far more than the old castle, which warriors and murderers once occupied, is the temple of industry in Blarney village in the shape of the tweed manufactory of Martin Mahony & Brothers, the largest and principal one in Ireland. The intelligent manager, Mr. Thomas T. Scott, a Scotchman, kindly showed us all the operations, scouring the wool, carding three times over by intricate machines, spinning, weaving, fulling, dressing, etc. The spinners most took my attention. They are carriages from seventy-two to one hundred feet long, running evenly on wheels, each spinner having 350 or 400 spindles. The spinner draws back some six feet or more at a time, the four hundred spindles each pulling out a thread from an untwisted small roll, just the same as my mother used to pull out a single thread on an old-fashioned hand-wheel, and twisted it in the same way, and then the spinner rolled back, and the twisted thread was wound on a bobbin. In this way the four hundred threads were drawn out and twisted as rapidly as my mother drew out and twisted one thread. Such is the triumph of machinery.

I was also much interested with the intricate and perfect machinery for combing wool for worsted work, the warp for serges, etc.; but I will not undertake to describe the machinery or process. The number of spinners is some twenty or thirty, and the number of looms over a hundred, capable of weaving two yards wide.

Mr. Scott has greatly enlarged and improved the works since he has undertaken the control of them, and I am inclined to think that Scotch thriftiness and good management has had much to do with the success of the establishment. He employs seven hundred hands, largely women, but he informed me that he has much difficulty in getting good hands. He finds the Irish greatly disinclined to stick steadily at mill work, many seeming to prefer to do some outside work at two shillings a week to working in the mill at six per week. He regards Irish help as uncertain and unsatisfactory.

Of tweeds (woolen goods woven by a figure or pattern), cassimeres, serges, and flannels, the mill turns out two hundred pieces per week of fifty yards each, besides a quantity of yarns. Many of the woven goods are sent to America for men's wear. I saw a large number of samples being made up for the New York market for 1882. Buminger & Co. are the parties there to whom the goods are shipped. Water and steam are both used in running the machinery of the mill. When water is abundant, 150 horse-power is thus provided, but sometimes it falls to thirty horse-power, and in all cases steam makes up the deficiency. The factory is well managed, and turns out a good quality of goods. Ireland should have hundreds of such establishments. She has the surplus labor and the raw material in abundance; but the enterprise and spirit are lacking. Aside from the works at Belfast and vicinity, this establishment is the principal one in the country. Poplins, etc., used to be manufactured at Dublin, but the works there are not prospering. Laces are manufactured to some extent at Limerick and other places, but not nearly to one-fourth the extent the people are capable of.

Our ride back to Cork by another road, the valley of the Lee opening up before us with all its charming beauty, I must again say presented some of the prettiest views I have seen in Ireland, and I have seen many that are lovely in the extreme. I was charmed with the entire loveliness of the surrounding country, with its gently sloping hills under full cultivation; its fertile valleys; its numerous rich and comfortable-looking homes on every hand. Many of the rich business men of Cork have residences within two or three miles of the city. The formation of the country affords lovely sites for residences, and these have been well improved. Near the city is a fine and extensive insane asylum for the city and county, capable of accommodating over a thousand patients.

Soon after our ride Mr. Bridges repaired to the steamer for Liverpool, he having decided to proceed at once to London, while I propose to cross over to Wales and take a view of that country. He sails to-day, while the steamer for Milford, South Wales, where I have decided to go, does not sail till to-morrow, and I conclude the best thing I can do is to wait for her. I am now at the steamer to see Mr. Bridges off.

I ought, perhaps, to say a word about our health. Mine is excellent. Mr. Bridges's has improved materially. He has been in rather poor health for a long time, and he tells me that he has had no good appetite for a year. I remarked to him that if he has no appetite now, he eats the heartiest without an appetite of any man I ever saw.

Wednesday, Aug. 24th.—After seeing Mr. Bridges off for Liverpool yesterday, I looked about the town some, and walked out to the race-course where the great attraction now is. I am not passionately fond of horse-racing, this being the second race I have attended in my life, though I have had numerous opportunities for doing so; but the time was hanging rather heavily upon my hands, and I wished to see a little more of the customs of the people. I judge fully ten thousand people were in attendance at the race course, though the numbers are said to be less than usual. I witnessed two races, the first being an entry of five running horses and the last one of six—it being a hurdle race, the horses having to leap, while running, over obstructions about three and a half or four feet high—or about the hight of a lowish farm fence. Five of the horses scaled these beautifully and went flying away with the wings of the wind, but the sixth horse, less courageous or willing, suddenly halted, and after leaping once finely, refused to jump again. The running was very good, and the betting tolerably free; but it occurred to me that it was a poor use to put the horses to, and a bad way to use up the people's time. There were thousands there who looked as though they needed work and the comforts it brings.

Perhaps to make amends for attending a horse-race I walked to the other extreme end of the city and looked in to see St. Fionn's new cathedral, a very tall, stately, and expensive edifice, costing, probably, some hundreds of thousands of dollars. I could not help thinking, "What a waste of money, and how much more good it would have done could it have been spent for man instead of for God, in making the wretched homes of the poor more comfortable!" God does not need the house, but the poor do sadly need the wealth it cost. It is said to be the finest cathedral in Ireland, and has three tall and expensive spires.

To make amends again for visiting the cathedral, in the evening I went to the theater, and for one shilling had a front seat in the "pit"—in our own country the parquette—and saw a fine rendition of "My Awful Dad," and "A Roland for an Oliver." Mr. Sidney was the star, and was sustained by a good company. I seldom care to attend theater or church at home, but occasionally feel like it when abroad. One sometimes likes to see how other folks do up things.

Cork is a tolerably lively town with nearly 78,000 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Lee, and has several wide and pretty streets, a college, and a few statues and monuments, among which I noticed a fine statue to the memory of Father Matthew, who is deserving of the honor. He did much to lessen the intemperance of Ireland, but unfortunately there is very much more of the same kind of work still to be done. Cork is called the capital of the south. This locality was once the home of the McCarthys and O'Mahonys, and the soil in the neighborhood has often been wet with human blood. In the war of the Protectorate, Cork held out as a loyal city, but in 1649 was surprised and taken. The severities of Cromwell are much commented upon. It is related of him that while on his short sojourn at Cork he caused the church bells to be cast into cannon. On being remonstrated with against committing such profanity, he replied that as a priest had been the inventor of gunpowder, he thought the best use of bells would be to cast them into canons—meaning, of course, a kind of pun on the word cannon. It was in Cork that William Penn, the father of Pennsylvania, became a believer in Quakerism. He visited the city to look after some of his father's property, and became convinced of the correctness of the teachings of George Fox under the preaching of one Thomas Loe. He was thrown into prison with eighteen fellow converts, but after a time was released. Christians have long had a fondness for throwing people into prison who cannot believe exactly as is prescribed for them. The good William Penn had to go to prison more than once, and should it be my fate to experience prison life again I cannot forget my illustrious predecessors.

Just imagine me now on the steamer Lee, waiting for the time for the craft to steam down the beautiful river Lee to Queenstown, and then to Milford Haven. The crew and attachés are busy in driving on sheep, hogs, cattle, and horses, which Ireland is sending over to Wales, and even the quacking of ducks which are aboard reaches my ears. I have been watching the loading of these dumb animals on to the steamer, and have felt sorry to see how much pounding, how much punching with goads and clubs, the poor brutes have to endure from cruel man. Man's inhumanity to man has been the wail of one sympathetic poet, but man's inhumanity to brutes deserves the rebuke of thousands of others. How can a merciful God sit up in heaven on his golden throne and look down and see all the pounding, beating, and starving that poor speechless animals have to endure, and be perfectly unmoved at it and never raise even a little finger to prevent it? As bad a man as I am believed to be, had I infinite power resting upon me, I certainly would do something to defend and protect the poor brutes of the world, and something, even, for the poor, suffering, starving, downtrodden, and oppressed of the human race. If I were God, I think I would do something with my infinite power to make the world a trifle happier and better, or I would resign and start a peanut stand.

Now, as I am about to leave Ireland, and perhaps forever, a few reflections are crowding themselves upon my mind, which I feel like getting rid of by throwing them upon you. The area of Ireland amounts to 20,808,271 acres, more than half of which is arable, fertile land, very productive of the crops adapted to it. Its resources and abilities are great, but it is very far from being a prosperous country. England may be somewhat at fault for this, for in the past she has been oppressive toward her more dependent sister isle, but at present Ireland has all the advantages in legal enactments possessed by Scotland, Wales, and even England herself. The "Land bill," which has just become a law, gives the people of Ireland advantages not possessed by the people of Wales and should have a pacifying and beneficial effect upon the people of the country. If exorbitant rents are charged to tenants, the latter have redress by taking their cases into court, where a disinterested authority has the appraising and fixing of the rent within the bounds of reason. Another great advantage gained is the privilege provided in the bill for tenants to become purchasers of their homes; and this feature should be greatly enlarged. The holding of the land by a few persons is a great evil and should be abated. Land-holders should have a certain number of years in which to sell their ill-gotten lands to absolute tillers of the soil—in fact they should be compelled to do so, and if purchasers cannot be found, government should take the land at a fairly appraised value, and then lease it out or sell it on liberal terms to those who need homes and labor. No man should own land in excess of certain stipulated amounts. Government should take all the surplus until bona fide tillers and purchasers can be found. In fact, it is a serious question whether the earth's surface should be owned as private and personal property any more than the waters on the surface, or than that ownership should be claimed for the light of the sun, the air we breathe, and the expanse above us. Why, tell me, has not every person born the same natural right to the land of the world that he has to drink of the waters of springs and streams, to breathe the pure, free air of heaven, and to bask in the glorious sun-light, which shines free for all? Land-ownership, and land-tenure, in the way they have been conducted in this and other countries, are evils of excessive magnitude, and have been the basis of a system of tyranny and oppression most destructive of the happiness and welfare of mankind.

The industries of Ireland are not as well directed for the welfare of the people as they should be. The manufactures are not ten per cent of what they should be. I have spoken of the small amount of manufacturing done here; with the exception of the linen and a small amount in woolens and cotton there is nothing to speak of, and there has been a diminution in place of an increase. To show the difference in this regard between England and Ireland I will state that in England one person lives by agriculture while eight live by manufactures; while in Ireland eight persons live by agriculture while one lives by manufactures; so, by the cheap breadstuffs which America furnishes, England is more benefited than injured, while to Ireland it means poverty and starvation. America has generously fed thousands of starving Irishmen, but the cheapness at which she furnishes, wheat, flour, and corn has prevented other thousands from realizing remunerative prices for their agricultural labor.

The direct tax upon Ireland to sustain the British government is $35,000,000. Total rental of her lands $65,000,000. Total $100,000,000. To meet this drain she sends of produce to England $60,000,000; manufactured fabrics to other countries, say, $5,000,000, leaving $35,000,000 to be paid in other ways, and how it is done I am unable to say. With this outlook before us Ireland seems doomed to grow poorer and poorer year by year. The direct tax to the government being $35,000,000, rents paid to absent landlords $25,000,000, makes a total of $60,000,000 taken out of the country every year, none of which is returned. How a country can prosper with such a heavy and unreciprocal drain to be kept up is very hard to understand.

A discouraging feature for the prosperity of the future is the decrease in population, the decrease in manufactures, the decrease in the amount of grain raised, and, what seems the strangest of all, the decrease in cattle and sheep raised. Within the last five years there has been a diminution in the number of sheep of 1,000,000, hogs 500,000, and cattle 500,000. The decrease in population may thus be seen: At one time the population was 9,000,000; in 1841 8,175,124; in 1851, 6,551,970; in 1871, 5,402,759; in 1881, estimated at 4,500,000. This falling off has arisen from emigration and not from natural decrease, for no people in the world increase so rapidly. If there is any class of mothers in the world who raise more children per capita I would be very glad to know where they are. Prevention of child-bearing, which is so well understood in France, England, and particularly in America, is unknown in Ireland. Every mother has as many children as she is capable of giving birth to, whether she is able to feed one-fourth part or one-tenth part of them or not. The Catholic church does not wish to lose one of its heirs; every child born of Catholic parents is sure to be a Catholic, and for this reason Catholic mothers are enjoined under the penalties of purgatory to do nothing whatever to prevent conception, nothing to limit or avoid excessively large families. This is an evil. No mother should bring into the world more children than she is able to feed and care for properly. A word cannot be said in defense of abortions; they not only ruin the health of the persons upon whom they are practiced, but they are otherwise absolutely criminal. It is not so with simple prevention. Every mother ought to have the intelligence to safely govern the number of the family she is able to properly rear, and none ought to add to the incomputable number of wretched human beings to starve, suffer, and die, or at best eke out a miserable existence. Prevention is legitimate and right, Comstock and the Catholic bishops to the contrary notwithstanding; and well would it be if a million or so of efficient syringes had for the last three score of years been in the hands of Irish mothers. Ireland has suffered intensely, and is still suffering, from over child-bearing. There are hundreds of thousands in this country now dragging out a most wretched existence who would be infinitely better off had they remained in the state of nihility.

Could Ireland own her own land and have her own government it would unquestionably be better for her. The lands of every country, though owned by a few persons, ought to be owned by the people of the country. Absenteeism of landlords is a great evil. Could Ireland have her own parliament, as Canada, Australia, and British India have to considerable extent their own home government, it would be vastly better for her. Ireland was never so prosperous as for the eighteen years of the last century when she had her own parliament, though it was founded on unjust, unequal principles. When the union was formed in 1800 and the parliament became only a fractional part of the British Parliament, Dublin and all Ireland receded in wealth and prosperity. Hundreds of wealthy families left Ireland and removed to England, where they have since remained, thus permanently depriving Ireland of a great aggregate of wealth and influence. Could her own government be restored to her upon a just basis she could enact laws best adapted to her own interests. Now her representation in the British Parliament is but a fraction—too small to insure the passage of such laws as she most wants, and about the only course left her members is the questionable one of hindering and retarding legislation.

Whether the Irish people are really capable of judicious self-government I will not now stop to discuss; but it is too true that her sons are too liable to quarrel with and oppose each other to give good promise for a peaceful future. This is a conspicuous feature in Irish character: If a farmer has a pretty good farm and is doing middling well, though he is paying every penny the land is worth, some neighbor becomes envious of him and wishes to supplant him in the farm, and goes to the landlord and says, "I will give you one or two pound more an acre for that farm that Mahoney is on than what he is paying you." The landlord, of course, is greedy and wishes to get all the money he can from his land, and at once notifies Mahoney that he must the next year pay the additional rent offered or leave the farm, and in that way he is often compelled to pay more rent than he can possibly make from the land, and ruin befalls him; or if McGinness, by over-bidding, obtains the farm instead of Mahoney, he is equally unfortunate; he is unable to raise the rent and is ruined.

Another common method of one Irishman injuring another is in the way of going security for a neighbor to raise a certain sum of money to pay rent, and then treacherously relinquishing him at the critical moment, allowing him to be sold out by the bailiff. It is often done in this way: Jimmy Murphy says to Mike O'Gorman: "And faith, Jimmy, I don't know what to do to raise the rint. I lack thirty pounds and there is no way for me to raise the money. My cattle, my pigs, my horses, and my sheep will all have to go, and Biddy and the childer will be turned out of doors, wid no roof over them but the stars."

"Och! mon alive! none of that! If its only thirty pound ye want, will not I sign for ye? Get it from the bank, and pay the rint. And did ye say Biddy is poorly and ye want some medicine for her, and ye want a new dress for her? Then, mon, make it fifty pounds and ye can have what ye need."

Jimmy is of course overjoyed to get out of his troublesome dilemma, and with Mike's name to his paper he gets the money to pay the rent and buy the medicine and dry goods. But next year the weather is bad and the crops come in light; perhaps he loses a horse, and when rent-day comes round he has not enough to meet it, let alone paying the note. Mike tells him to cheer up, that a note for seventy-five pounds can be made, the first note paid, and the rent squared. Jimmy is very glad to get off so, but probably next year his trouble is greater than ever, and this time Mike plays him false. He takes the trouble to tell the bank folks that Jimmy is doing no good, that he shall not sign with him again, and that they had better look out for their money. A few days after, Jimmy goes to the bank accompanied by Pat Mulligan, and, both taking off their hats and bowing very reverently, Jimmy says: "I beg yer pardon, yer honors. My neighbor Pat has been kind enough to come down to renew that note with me, and with God's blessing I hope next year with better crops to pay it off. Will yer honors be kind enough to let me renew it?"

The bank man, prompted by Mike, says:

"No, Mr. Murphy, we cannot renew it again, and besides, we want our money at once, and if you cannot pay it we shall proceed against you without delay."

Then the poor man is in trouble, sure enough. He cannot pay the note, and the bailiff is set at work. Then Mike goes to the landlord and says Jimmy is doing no good for the country. He (Mike) can no longer be on his paper, the bankers are pressing for their money, and it stands him (the landlord) in hand to use means to get his rent. Jimmy's stock is seized, he is without a home, and he and his family are cast upon a cold, unfeeling world, and told that he is no good to the country and had better get out of it. If he can get to America he is fortunate, and there begins the world anew. Thus Irishmen often treat each other, and this has been the experience of many.

I hear of evictions being frequently made by means of the constables, sheriffs, and police, and often causing much hardship. These cases create much excitement and dissatisfaction. Ireland is fully supplied with police. In little towns of 500 inhabitants I have seen half a dozen or more of the idle police. I also see the red-coats (soldiers) in the larger towns.

The number of land-holders in Ireland is 10,000. Instead of this they should number 200,000, every tiller having a farm of his own. One lord or duke I was told of who has 500,000 acres, while over 4,000,000 have not a foot.

One of the great evils which weigh down upon Ireland is intemperance in whisky and tobacco. They are both used to excess. I need not stop to tell you their bad effects. When every man is constantly smoking, and a duty of seventy-five cents a pound is paid upon tobacco, the heavy and useless expense can be easily understood, but the whisky-drinking is far, far worse. I will not enlarge upon it. It is emphatically the curse of the country. No class of people can prosper who make an excessive use of intoxicating drinks. They ruin all possibility of prosperity.

But a great evil, and perhaps the greatest of all Ireland is cursed with, is too much Christianity and too many priests. Every man, woman, and child is a zealous supporter of the Christian religion; they are the most religious people in the world. There is hardly a Freethinker among them. There are over 8,000 priests in the country, and they are the best dressed, the most leisurely, and the most useless class of men that I have met with. They are the tyrants and oppressors of the country. They exact their fees and their perquisites though their victims starve. What if they do to some extent restrain the brutal passions of their ignorant lackeys? it does not atone for the harm they produce. They keep the people in ignorance and gross superstition, from which they never will arise so long as priestcraft like an incubus crushes them. The rule which the Irish priests exercise over their dupes is terrible, as we have often seen in our own country. In cases of riot, while working at constructing our railroads, the priests have not unfrequently been known to go among their drunken, fighting church-members and belabor them over the heads and shoulders with clubs, and the poor, cringing slaves have taken the beating without having the soul or independence to raise a voice or hand against the priest. This is assuredly not a healthy control. It may be better than drunken rioting and killing, but it is not the kind of control to make free, spirited, and independent men. It may possibly answer for brutes, but it will not do for intelligent human beings.

When in conversation with Mr. Cusack, and condemning the influence of such priestcraft, he asked me what I would substitute for that control and how such a people could be better governed. I answered: "Mr. Cusack, I would raise the general intelligence. I would educate men and women in the truths of science, and inculcate in their minds correct moral teachings independent of priestly superstitions and falsehoods. In short, Mr. Cusack, I would have all the men of Ireland like yourself, intelligent and self-reliant. You are a moral man; you do right because it is better to do right than any other course. I find you a man of excellent general intelligence and information. You require no priest. You are capable of being your own priest, and I would that every man in Ireland was like unto you." I thought he seemed slightly struck with that thought, and he for the moment seemed to admit the force of the argument. He is a genial, amiable, intelligent man, and I wish he had a better religion than he was reared in. The change in the education and religion of a people must be necessarily slow, but if it is never begun it will never be consummated.

As remarked, the Land bill will prove a good measure for Ireland, and will tend to pacification on the part of the masses; but there is a restless, uneasy element in Ireland that will not be quiet until home rule is established, and then I fear dissensions and turmoil would prove nearly as great an evil as they at present have to complain of.

The Irish are not as thrifty as the Scotch or the Welsh; they will be poor and degraded when those others will be prosperous. Were the Scotch to supplant the Irish in Ireland, within the next five years manufactures would spring up, and prosperity would smile on the land. Ireland is now a land of beggars.

I have had healthy, strong, hardv men ask me for alms; and as many as fifty people per day, of all shades, have held out their hands in a craven manner and asked me in the name of the Virgin and her son to give them a perny. Nothing of that kind is seen in Scotland, though the country, as a whole, is far poorer than Ireland. But the religion, the frugality, and the independence of the two peoples are quite different. Ireland has produced many great and good men, but vastly greater numbers of craven, treacherous, and superstitious devotees of a false religion.

I admire the good points in the people, but do not like her intemperance, her thriftlessness, her improvidence, her superstition, her servility to priestcraft, her impudence and insolence. In view of this state of things, I would prefer to spend six days in the country to twelve.

I do not remember saying much of the fisheries in Ireland. The rivers and coasts are well supplied with choice fish, which are obtained in large numbers. Salmon abound in the larger streams. Large numbers are caught in all the rivers. In Galway, a distance of a hundred yards was pointed out on the river where a rental of $5,000 is paid for the privilege of salmon-fishing. At the mouth of the Shannon one hundred tons of mackerel are annually caught, at a profit of $50,000; but the fishing is done by Scotch fishermen, and the fish are sent principally to England.

I intended to visit Knock and look into the miracle business a little, but I did not know exactly where it is, and in fact have thought but little of it within the last few days. I learn the miracles are still continuing. This speaks badly for the intelligence of the people. A people cannot believe in such impossibilities as miracles unless fully immured in the darkness of religious superstition. It requires ignorance to make miracles a possibility.

It would be desirable to dwell upon many points of interest and history in southern Ireland; to dwell somewhat upon how Catholicism was introduced into Ireland in the reign of Henry VIII.; how Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, by treachery, force, and fraud changed the religion of the country; how the monks of Tara, a species of Druidic worshipers, spread their teachings through Europe which were adopted by the church, but this letter is already very long, and I must close.

The steamer is already started on its journey down the beautiful valley to Queenstown, a point where I touched last year. We are even out on the ocean, and to-morrow morning will be in Wales. Goodbye. Fraternally, D. M. B.

Four Days in Wales.

PEMBROKE DOCKS, So. WALES, Aug. 25, 1881.

ESTEEMED FRIENDS: I have left the land of the McKinzies, the Fraziers, the Macdonalds, the McGregors, etc., of Scotland; the O'Flahertys, the Mulligans, the O'Garrittys, the O'Shaunessys, the McFinigans, of Ireland, and am now in the land of the Owenses, the Joneses, the Evanses, the Davises, the Williamses, the Edwardses, the Morgans, the Thomases, etc., here in Wales. Our departure from Cork and our ride down the river, some sixteen miles to the ocean, counted one of the loveliest valleys in the world, would have been very pleasant at 5 and 6 P. M. had it not been for the rain which had to attend us, though it was not heavy. We had, in passing, a fine view of Queenstown, where I spent three hours last year. When outside the splendid harbor we took a southeast course, but it was some two hours before we lost sight of the southern coast of Ireland.

The passage was smooth, and we arrived at Milford at daylight this morning, the rain still continuing with a driving wind. And still the rain keeps on. Oh, what a country for rain! This is harvest time; much of the grain is cut and lying in the fields; the wheat, barley, and oats are sprouting, some before it is cut. Yes, still the rain continues and the weather is cold. Overcoats can by no means be dispensed with. Farmers cannot be blamed for having the blues, and for thinking that the weather god is not extremely good to them. Possibly all this rainy weather ought to be attributed to the prayer for good weather recently written out, offered up, and recommended for the use of the churches throughout the realm, by that humble follower of Jesus, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is willing to be a despised follower of the Lamb for the pitiful salary of £15,000 per year, or $75,000. He has made a special prayer for good weather, since which it has done little but rain. Who can longer doubt the efficacy of prayer?

Milford is an inconsiderable town of two or three thousand, but it has the finest harbor in Great Britain. The Great Eastern can at low tide come up the Haven nearly twenty miles from the ocean and proceed ten miles above Milford without difficulty. By the bye, the Great Eastern is now lying just below Milford undergoing painting and repairs, with the view of selling her. She has thus far proved a very unprofitable piece of property. It costs more to run her than can be made by the operation.

The grandness of Milford Haven as an excellent, safe, and commodious harbor has led to the inauguration of an enterprise that must greatly add to the prosperity of Milford, and also be of much interest to the United States. Several first-class ocean steamers are now being constructed at Glasgow to ply between New York and Milford. They are being built with a view to speed, and will have powerful engines to insure fast running, and it is expected the trip will be made in seven days. Milford will have the advantage for ocean steamers from America over any other port in Europe; it is the nearest and most direct, and it has the deepest, safest, and best harbor. The majority of the steamers from America go to Liverpool, but the much greater distance from Queenstown to Liverpool than to Milford takes fast steamers half a day to run, and the Mersey is not deep enough for large steamers to go in at low tide, which often necessitates the waiting several hours for the tide. The passage by rail from Milford to London is no farther, if as far, as from Liverpool. If the ocean passage can be made in seven days it will be a great consideration to the large number of Americans who every year visit Europe, and which is every year increasing. The great impetus it must give to Milford as a first-class ocean steamer port has been fully estimated, and capitalists have bought up a large share of the real estate of the town, and everything there has a buoyant tendency. I am told that several Americans have taken stock in the new ocean line, and in the Milford property. A large amount of money, I should think millions of dollars, has been expended in constructing the best kind of stone docks for the accommodation of the forthcoming steamers, and the harbor has been thoroughly dredged in the immediate vicinity. The highest confidence is placed in the entire enterprise.

I crossed the Haven to this point where the British government has very extensive docks for the building of large war steamers with heavy armor. The grounds comprise a hundred acres, and are inclosed by a massive wall, twelve feet high, laid in mortar. It has been built more than fifty years, and looks as though it would easily stand five hundred or five thousand longer.

I applied to the office for admittance, and, as foreigners are not admitted without a permit from the Admiralty, I was taken to G. W. Parkin's office, and after sending in my card, was in a few minutes granted an audience. Mr. Parkins hesitated for a while about allowing me to go through the works. He said I should have obtained a letter from the American minister at London, taken it to the Admiralty, and obtained a permit. I informed him that I had not been to London, nor was I aware that it was necessary to obtain a permit. I assured him that I merely wished to see the construction of the heavy plated war steamers, and that I wished to steal no secrets, nor use any information obtained to the detriment of her majesty's government. He then very kindly consented to my seeing what I wished, and instructed Inspector Harding to place me in charge of an intelligent constable who would afford me that privilege. Accordingly constable G. Venning accompanied me around the works, allowing me to see the various operations performed.

The docks are of hewn stone, and are four hundred feet in length and twenty or thirty in depth, the sides coming near together at the bottom and spreading from the bottom upwards, so as to conform to the shape of the hull of a steamer, and are on an incline of perhaps ten feet or more, so that when the leviathans are launched they will move gently down the rollers on which they rest. A substantial structure, five hundred feet in length, with a slate roof, incloses the docks, which, in the severest weather, with the continual heat employed, makes the vast apartments comfortable for the numerous workmen, some 1,400 being employed upon the entire premises.

What shall I say of the three iron monsters in course of construction? I should rather say steel monsters, for they are largely of the improved steel, which costs but little more than iron, and is stronger, tougher, and better. The names of the three steamers now building are the Collingwood, the Majestic, and the Amphion. The first two are first-class armor-plated steamers, 325 feet in length, 68 feet beam, 9,150 tons displacement, that is, that number of tons of iron and steel will be employed in their construction. Their engines are 7,000 horse-power. Just think of it, nearly ten thousand tons of iron and steel in a single vessel, and that floating like a cork and going in all the deep waters of the globe. The Amphion is 300 feet long, 46 beam, 3,748 tons, with 5,000 horse-power engine. This is called a second-class steamer, is a cruiser, and will not have the very heavy armor plating of the other two. All three have the ram construction—strong, sharp prows—so powerful, and the momentum and force of the huge vessels so great, as to pierce and crush everything they come in contact with.

The Collingwood is a barbette ship, that is, she has no revolving turrets, but the guns are raised and lowered by the screw process, while the Majestic has two turrets which revolve by hydraulic power. The four guns on each of the two large vessels are to weigh forty-three tons each, with six six-inch guns, and on the Collingwood four machine or Gattling guns.

The ribs of the monsters are very heavy, and forged to the exact shape, of iron or steel, each one, to give the steamer the proper form, varying a trifle from its fellows in shape. These are set in their proper places and strongly secured, and to them three-quarter-inch steel plates are firmly bolted. The armor-plates, sixteen or eighteen inches thick, are placed over the inner thin plates. Between the inner and outer plates are thirty inches of solid teak wood, brought from India. English oak will not answer the purpose, as the acid it contains causes it, thus confined between the two steel platings, to rot in a few years. Teak is equally solid and possesses a greasy nature which seems to preserve it, and is the only wood found to answer the purpose. It is a large tree brought from India hewn in a square form as large and long as the trees will make. The thirty inches of this solid wood offers additional resistance to the eighteen inches of steel to impede the force of the shot which may come against it.

I also saw hundreds of tons of cork in slabs or sheets, which is also used in certain parts of the steamers for additional protection against intruding shot, and is, of course, placed under the steel plates.

The Majestic is the most advanced in construction, and the officer took me on board of her. I assure you I was forcibly struck with her ponderosity and her immensity. Everything seems to have been done that can be to add strength, security, and power, without the slightest regard to expense. The deck is covered with two courses of plates of hardened steel each two inches thick, and some eight by ten feet in size. The turrets are some thirty feet in diameter, or rather that is the size of the opening in the deck, above which the turrets project, and have bearings or rollers on the deck. They are moved with facility in time of action, and after one gun is fired the turret is at once moved and another gun brought to the proper position while the first is being reloaded. The guns are enabled to discharge in any direction, fore and aft or at broadside. In the center of the deck, running lengthwise, are placed the cabins of the officers, all constructed of steel, strong, airy, and well lighted. I was taken below deck to the captain's apartments, to the dining-room, store-rooms, kitchen, etc. The rooms are ample, and are being fitted up in excellent style. The only places where I saw wood being used in the fittings are doors and frames. The room for coal and for the men is ample, as well as for all the purposes of the steamer. The interior of the vessel is to be thoroughly supplied with condensed air.

The heavy armor is not placed over the entire steamer, but over the citadel—the middle part, where the turrets are and where the projectiles and amunition are stored—and does not go below the water-edge. The steamer is made in compartments, so if one or more parts are perforated the vessel will still float. The vessel is propelled by two heavy screw wheels, one on each side, near the stern. The whole attachments holding the screws are of great strength and braced most firmly. The wrist in which the end of shaft of the screw rests is of solid steel and so heavy that breaking would appear utterly impossible. The rudder is so far under the stern and so thoroughly secured that it would seem out of the question for it to be carried away.

The ribs, the plates, and all the different heavy parts of these steamers are prepared elsewhere than on the ground—largely in Sheffield, and some at other points. Everything is made to the proper shape before brought here, and every piece is closely examined by government inspectors, before being brought to the dock-yards. If the slightest flaw or imperfection is found the piece is discarded. The machines and tools for completing and fitting the various parts are necessarily large, strong, and ponderous. The punching machines, the drilling machines, the planers, the lathes, etc., are of the largest and strongest kind. Heavy steam hammers are used for shaping and forging; a powerful hydraulic press of thousands of tons pressure is used for giving the desired shape to the sixteen and eighteen inch armor plates. Though they weigh twenty tons they are put in a heating furnace and brought to a red heat and then placed under the hydraulic press, which is powerful enough to at once bring them to the desired shape. It is wonderful what power there is in water and air when properly manipulated. As powerful as steam is it is immensely superseded in force by cold water and air. Plates to the thickness of 1¼ inches are punched, but beyond that thickness are drilled. Of course there are many machines employed in this establishment, many powerful cranes and processes for lifting and conveying heavy bodies of steel that cannot well be described without taking too much time and space. Suffice it to say the vast shops are fully supplied with all the apparatus and machinery necessary to perform the work. No cost has been spared in the furnishing of the tools and equipments.

I left the vast establishment grateful to Captain Parkin and Constable Venning and fully impressed with the strength, the capacity, and energy of the British government. After leaving the dock-yards I looked some over the solid, clean-looking town, seeing no signs of either magnificence or abject poverty. The rain still continuing, I did not prolong my walk, but made my way here to the station (depot), where I had to wait some hours for the train to Tenby. On my way to the station I met with a slight divertisement which pleased me somewhat. A stout, buxom Welsh lass was driving along the street two not more than half-grown pigs, weighing probably two hundred pounds each. Whether she had taken them out for a walk this rainy morning, I cannot say, but I inferred that the pigs had not been allowed full liberty, for each had a small rope ten feet long tied to one of the hind legs. The lass and the pigs, just as I came along, reached a close gate opening into a yard where the lass wished the pigs to enter, but, hog-like, they got contrary and resolved not to enter thereat, evidently preferring to remain in the street a longer period. An old man was assisting the lass to get the pigs to enter the gate, but the pigs seemed resolved not to comply. I halted, inclined to render any little assistance that might be needed. The pigs utterly rebelled at passing through the gate and started off in different directions in spite of the old man and the stout, rosy lass. But the lass was equal to the emergency; she sprang and caught one of the ropes and soon Mr. pig was brought to a stand, while he set up a very audible squealing, which, however, she did not regard, but caught the porker by the hind leg and dragged him into the yard. In the process her hat was blown off by the brisk wind and rolled down the gutter in which the water was abundant. I could not be less gallant than secure the bonnet while she was so vigorously employed and say, "Go it, Sal; I will hold your bonnet." She did not mind the blowing away of the hat, but at once secured pig number two in the same manner and dragged him into the yard before she gave a look after the hat. She thanked me with a smile, and with another smile I left her and came on to the station.

August 29th.—I did not visit Pembroke Castle, as the weather was unfavorable for it. It was a little distance away, and my admiration for old castles—the residence of the lords of former centuries—is not excessively great.

I next stopped at the fine old seaside town of Tenby, situated in a crescent form on an elevated rocky bluff or promontory, a hundred feet or more above the waters of Carmarthen Bay. I had a letter from a friend in New York to Mr. M. P. Davies, a druggist of the town, and first of all, upon leaving the station, I hunted him up. He knew of my expected arrival, and received me with true cordiality, as also did his interesting and intelligent wife. When the rain had subsided, Mr. Davies and Mr. Evans, a brother of Mrs. Davies, took me out and showed me the town and its splendid views of the almost surrounding waters of Carmarthen Bay and the country forming the rest of the circle. On the extreme prominence of the high bluff is a lovely green, where a band discourses music, while the waves dash in concert at the foot of the rocks below. Here stands a beautiful statue and monument in Sicilian marble of H. R. H., the late Prince Consort, Prince Albert.

Tenby was prcbably founded by the Danes prior to the Norman conquest, and was subsequently occupied by the Flemings, who settled in this part of Wales in considerable numbers. Though the town now looks modern and neat, its old castle, the remnants of the old wall which once surrounded the town, and the other relics of the past, bespeak its mature age. Its regular population is about five thousand, and the visitors who resort here, both in summer and winter, as it is an agreeable seaside watering place, number about as many more. A splendid full German band, who are hired through the summer season, were out on the bluff and discoursed excellent music, which numerous persons, though it was wet under foot and threatening overnead, were out listening to. We visited several interesting points, where splendid views are obtained, and saw numerous hotels, where visitors from various parts remain for weeks and months.

The evening was spent till a late hour in the discussion of theological subjects. Mr. Evans has recently graduated at Oxford from the divinity class, and is now prepared to enter the pulpit of the established church and break the bread of life to hungry parishioners, though he proposes to defer clerical duties for a year or two, and spend the interim in teaching. He now has a position as tutor at Brighton, and is at present away on vacation. Of course, my views are far too radical and advanced to find response in such quarters. I presume such opinions as I hold have rarely been enunciated in that locality. They seemed to be new and almost shocking. Mr. Davies is a good chemist, and has a scientific, analytical turn of mind, but his studies have not led him so far as the doctrines of Materialism—the great potency and eternality of matter. He has accepted the belief that the world and the entire universe had a creator, and that there was a time when everything in existence, save the Creator, had a beginning, and hence he embraces mainly the Bible story, save that he holds that the six days of creation were lengthened periods—perhaps millions of years each instead of days of twenty-four hours each. His effort has been to reconcile science and the Bible, and he has occasionally delivered a lecture in that direction.

He admitted that from his experience as a chemist he believed that there is not skill and power enough in all the world to create one atom of oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, or any other form of matter, from nothing, or by any possible process to convert one atom of any existing substance into nothing; and that this being the case it is very difficult to conceive how an imaginary being, of whom no man ever had the first iota of knowledge, could from nothing not only create this earth with all its rocks, gravel, clay, earths, fused and unfused metals, water, atmosphere, etc., but Jupiter, a thousand times larger than the earth, Saturn, nearly as large, the planets of the solar system, including two hundred asteroids and satellites, the sun in the center, nearly a million times larger than the earth, with tens of thousands and probably millions of other suns, worlds, systems, and constellations, many of which are so far distant as to require millions of years for their light—which travels at the rate of 200,000 miles per second—to reach us; and all this in six days, or even in six periods. He almost admitted that it was about as easy to admit that matter, like space, must necessarily always have existed, together with the forces which are inseparably connected with it, rather than to conceive that the tutelary God of the Jews, who seems to have been unknown, and to have no power save in the diminutive country known as Palestine, could have created it all from nothing. He seemed to comprehend that it is quite as easy to believe that any given quantity of substance, of whatever kind, that exists to-day, also existed thousands and millions of ages ago, as that some being or force to suddenly speak into existence that which had previously had no existence. He seemed to understand that nothing is a very poor kind of stuff of which to make suns and worlds, and that it must be very difficult for any kind of a being to accomplish the feat. I endeavored to show him that it is quite as easy and rational to conceive that what is always was in some form as to conceive that a being capable of creating it all from nothing could have existed forever. In reference to the Bible story it was not hard to show him the great improbability of the earth being older than the sun, and that it not only existed, but brought forth all the varieties of vegetation, including mosses, grasses, herbs, vegetables, shrubs, trees, and that all these brought forth flowers and perfected their fruits and seeds without any sun to aid in the intricate processes, and he readily showed a disposition to set that part of the story aside. He understands that the sun in indispensable in the full development of vegetation, and that to that extent that there must have been some mistake in the record.

As a man who appreciates science I asked him to point out a single passage or line in the whole Bible showing that its writers had the slightest comprehension of the simplest laws of nature and facts which almost every school-boy now understands. I asked what passage in the Bible even hints that the sun is a million times larger than the earth; that the earth is a sphere turning daily upon its axis, and yearly revolving around the sun; that the earth was once a ball of super-heated matter, on which for an inconceivable period it was impossible for any vegetable or animal life to exist upon it; that the condensing of the earth, with internal commotions, caused the uneven surface of the earth, deep valleys in some places and high mountains in others; that valcanoes exist in consequence of the internal heat of the earth; of the formation of igneous and aqueous rocks; of the formation of the various strata of the earth; that the lower stratum of rocks presents no indication of any form of life having existed at the time; that in supervening strata are found fossil remains of plants, low, crude reptiles first, then animals of higher grade, up to man; the existence of the coal plants, of their aggregation into strata, and they becoming covered with rocks, gravel, and earth to the depth of hills and mountains, which must have required many thousands of years to accomplish.

"Yes," I said, "tell me where in the Bible the first word is found in the least indicating that the writers of it had any knowledge of these things. Did they know anything of the existence of oxygen, of hydrogen, that the two united in the formation of water; of nitrogen, and that it united with oxygen in the composition of our atmosphere; of carbon, of chlorine, and many others of the elementary substances which we now know really exist? He readily admitted that the Bible does not teach science, and that its writers did not seem to know much of anything about the simplest truths of science which we now pretty well understand. "But," said he, "the Bible was not given to teach science." "No," I replied, "but it ought to tell the truth, and not inculcate falsehood by implication or otherwise."

If God wrote a letter or book to his children to give them the information they needed he should not mislead them by talking about the foundations, the pillars, the ends and corners of the earth, when it has nothing of the kind. It would have been far better for him to have described the rotundity of the earth, its motions, etc., etc., instead of concocting the silly yarn about a snake being able to circumvent and defeat him, about the snake speaking human language, and wheedling our great-grandmother, about knowledge growing on trees, and eternal life doing the same. I asked him if it was not a little difficult for him to believe that a being possessing the power and wisdom to create all the suns and systems that exist, to establish and regulate all the intricate laws and rules of matter in the production of chemical compounds, and the endless forms of vegetable and animal life could write such utter twaddle as that contained in the Bible—to say so much, and give so little of the real truth which his children stood so greatly in need of. Said I, "Is not the very fact that the book contains nothing more than man knew at that time, and far less than he knows now, that it pandered to the ignorance which then existed, and hinted not a word of the important truths which man has been compelled to dig out and learn by his own industry and research, positive evidence that a God of all knowledge did not write it, and that it was simply the production of men not yet enlightened by truth and science?"

As regards the length of the six days of the creation, I endeavored to show him that there was no warrant in the Bible to suppose that prolonged periods or ages were meant by the word day. The expression that "the evening and the morning were the first day," "the second day," etc., clearly shows that the author meant an ordinary day, as we understand it. If not, it was very wrong to mislead us by saying what he did not mean. If he meant a period of many ages, he should have said so, and not have deceived simple-minded people by talking about a day with one morning and one evening. Again, if day meant a great number of years in the first six instances it must have meant the same protracted period for the seventh day, when the creator from the exhaustive labor he had performed had to rest for a few millions of years, and did nothing while the universe ran on without his help. The word translated day in the last instance is the same as in the first, the same as translated day in hundreds of cases, and if in this way God attempted to mislead his readers, it must be a small, pitiful business indeed.

I also enlarged somewhat upon the numerous crudities, inaccuracies, frivolities, indecencies, and falsities of the old book and endeavored to show that it could not have been written or dictated by a being of infinite wisdom, goodness, and truth. We also branched off upon collateral subjects, including the non-originality of Christianity, and the non-superiority of its morals, but it is hardly worth while to undertake to repeat all that was said. I tried, at least, to do no discredit to the great cause which I fain would serve. Mr. Davis is not a superstitious devotee of mythical falsehoods and delusions, and readily drinks in the pure and faultless teachings of science. He needs only to follow up the line of study and thought in which he has begun, to bring him to a pretty clear appreciation of her laws.

Mr. Evans is a young man of fine intellect and acquirements, and though he expects to derive his livelihood from holding forth the dogmas of the church, he is not disinclined to hear the expression of greater truths, nor to be shocked at the vindication of nature and her laws. It is indeed a pity that so bright an intellect should be misapplied in teaching antique and untrue myths and fables.

In the morning Messrs. Davies and Evans saw me to the station and bade me a genial good-bye, and I was soon on my way to Carmarthen, long regarded as the capital of Wales, and a place of interest and importance. It is beautifully situated in the midst of a richly-cultivated district on the northwest bank of the river Towy, which, augmented by numerous tributaries, here becomes a wide, noble river, crossed by a handsome stone bridge, and hence is navigable to its outlet in the Bristol channel. This is the reputed home of the celebrated Welsh prophet Merlin, whose surname was Ambrosius, and who was born not far from the beginning of the sixth century, and who made remarkable prophecies in reference to the kings who ruled in England for seven or eight hundred years later—down to the time of Charles I., and which prophecies are said to have been remarbably fulfilled. If half that is told of him in a quaint old volume that Mr. Davies presented me—printed several years before I was born—is the truth he was more remarkable as a prophet than Joel, Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Mother Shipton all put together. And why should he not be? He was begotten by a ghost or spirit, and had no natural father, according to Thomas Heywood, who wrote the history only about a thousand years after the life of the prophet, giving the statement of the prophet's mother to the fact; and as she ought to know about it better than anybody else, who will be so incredulous as to disbelieve it? If you will only look around a little you need not longer wonder at what you have supposed the remarkable circumstance of our Jesus having been begotten without the aid of a visible person of the male persuasion, for

"What Will You Put in Its Place?"

BY ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Christianity, whatever form it takes—either Judaism, Paulism, Catholicism, or Protestantism, Unitarian, or Trinitarian—is objected to as not founded on facts, as a theory which the increasing knowledge of mankind is sure at last to exterminate. When Christians find themselvs unable to answer the objections, their last resort is to ask, "What will you put in its place? How will the world do without it?"

If you object to chemistry or geology, a scientist does not ask any such questions. They are silly ones to ask about Christianity if you cannot prove it to be true. No doubt there are truths taught by Christians as a part of Christianity which are not of its essence. They will stay. But the falsehood need not stay on their account. It may hav been asserted, but it surely has never yet been proved, that falsehood, as a general fact, or the belief of it, is essential to human well-being. Lies, however widely believed, must go as soon as they are found out, even if they leave a vacuum. Truth may not fill their place, but a cubic inch of it is better than a cubic mile of falsehood.

There happily will not be a vacuum when Christianity is gone. There is something better which is crowding it out. The question about what is to take its place is far more easily answered than Christians are apt to think.

If you dispel the clouds the sky remains. If you explode incredible dogmas self-evident truths remain. If Eden, the Lord God walking in it in the cool of the day, the universal deluge, the tables and thunders of Sinai, total depravity, the atonement by the death of a God-man, hades, hell, and the devil should all go to the limbos of vanity, the Golden Rule would not go. It would only shine brighter and brighter unto the perfect day. Nature did not wait for books to teach that. It shone into the heart and head of Confucius even a little more clearly than into those of Jesus. It seems natural to many animal tribes as well as man. The absence of it is exceptional, or society could not exist. It will grow the stronger the more you clear away the weeds of theology.

History is a recent achievement of human nature. The art of printing is not five hundred years old; that of writing had perhaps existed three times as long before printing began, but was confined to a few persons. Its first work was to record traditions which are nothing if not marvelous. The record of facts is always distorted and colored more or less by the prejudices of the writer and of the class or nation to which he belongs. That long line of written records, professing to giv the history of the human race from the origin of the first man and woman to the tragical death of one of the many men who hav been deified, which is now printed as the Bible, and generally accepted by Christendom as the inspired and infallible word of God, is no exception from this criticism. It begins with traditions unanswerably contradicted by the rocks. It is full of individual, class, race, and national prejudices. It is often irreconcilably at variance with contemporary records having apparently quite as valid a claim to divine authority.

It is utterly impossible for any rational person to accept as true the alleged facts on which the Christian religion is based. These facts are either unnatural or improbable, and are not supported by credible testimony. The only basis for an argument in favor of Christianity worthy of a moment's attention is that founded on its moral teachings and the lives of its disciples. Are the good morals original with these Jewish and Christian scriptures? Assuredly not. Are the virtues of Christians due to their theological dogmas? That is the only real question. If the virtues which ennoble life hav other causes than the belief in the Christian dogmas; if men and women can be kind, truthful, patriotic, honest, and industrious, irrespectiv of any theory of the supernatural or life after death, then there may be something valuable left after the dogmas go, and it may be vastly more effectiv without the dogmas than with them.

It surely is a fact that as pure and wise moral teaching exists out of the Bible as in it, so far as good conduct in this world is concerned. It is also an undeniable fact that as noble models of morality, patriotism, philanthropy, and heroism hav appeared outside the pale of Christianity as inside of it.

Now what does the historical record for eighteen hundred years, since the advent of Christianity, show?

It shows, in the first place, that one system of supernaturalism, or religion, overthrew another, and with it a certain degree of civilization, for the want of which the European world floundered for about a thousand years in what are called the "dark ages." Even granting that the new religion was better than the old, which is not quite so clear as it might be, that does not prove its goodness or necessity. It faced persecution bravely, as many flagrant falsehoods hav; but the moment it grasped power it persecuted. It preached and argued against its heathen opponents, but relied less on its own arguments and writings than on the physical destruction of theirs!

It was in its first two or three centuries unquestionably a grand uprising of the humbler classes of society against the intolerable tyranny of the higher; but as such it was by no means successful, for in three or four hundred years it resulted in making the union of priest and king more tyrannical than it ever was before. It was not any form of theology which was ever to liberate mankind, or establish anything like brotherhood in government. It was secular knowledge—knowledge of this world and not of another—which men wanted to render them free. The church was the very mother of ignorance, teaching that of which it knew nothing, and could imagin but little. It murdered all the science and most of the art of the Grecian and Roman worlds, and not till a rebellious something, in human nature itself, dug up some of the old literature, did light begin to break in upon the darkness which Paul and Peter had brought over the world.

The Hebrew religion adopted by Christendom, like all other religions, is founded on a theory which attempts to account for life, or assigns a cause of all things outside of the things themselvs. It assumes what it is impossible for us to know as a reason for the existence of what we do know. To a limited extent we can answer the question How? greatly to our own happiness; but we can only imagin an answer to the question Why? The theory answering Why? will produce happiness or misery, according as facts support or contradict it. The theory of an uncreated, external, omnipotent, omniscient creator, lawgiver, and governor, moral and physical, is no more susceptible of proof, a priori, than the other one—that matter, with its qualities, is uncreated, and that all life necessarily results. Either theory being beyond the grasp of human comprehension, it is idle if not worse, to spend a thought upon either. If a volent God, that is, a sovereign will, whether external or internal, is left out of account, does it follow that the distinction between right and wrong will be blotted out in any human being? Does it follow that no sense of obligation will be left?

Just the reverse. Mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, neighbors, friends, countrymen—men and women everywhere—will remain. Abstract, eternal truth will remain. The human passions and the human intellect will remain. Just in proportion as men cease to strain their vision into boundless vacuity they will use it effectivly on the realities within the grasp of their senses and reason. This is what we see going on now every day. When the human race contentedly allows God to hide himself just as if he were nowhere it will be moral governor to itself. It will find out that all the really good moral laws which the ancient priests hav promulgated were revealed to them through their senses by the nature of things, and not by a supreme person. It will find out that in the name of a supreme person priests hav really manufactured a frightful amount of sin for professional purposes. They lived and fattened on that sort of sin, and some of them still do. How a man can sin against some other knowable person or being, society, race, or nation, is patent to common sense. But how a man can sin against an infinit, omnipotent will—a person beyond comprehension—no priest or philosopher, not even the great Apostle of the Gentiles, has ever been able to explain. No matter for its motiv—it is an assumption founded on nothing.

There is no possibility of getting any common sense into the first table delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai, except by making God a figure of speech to represent aggregate humanity, or the will and wisdom of society, and not much at that. The whole of that history is a horrible myth. Supposing it a veritable narrativ of facts, no wonder that Moses on coming down and seeing that golden calf, and the people dancing naked like satyrs, broke both the tables. In the second one, the very God who had commanded the Israelites to steal the jewelry of the Egyptians—knowing, doubtless, that they would make a calf of it—forbade stealing! Then in a jealous rage he commanded a horrible amount of murder: "Slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor."

After three thousand such murders had been committed, Moses, if we are to credit the narrativ, went up again into the mountain, and God reëngraved both tables for him, with, "Thou shalt not kill!" in the second the same exactly as before! Taking this as a truthful narrativ of actual facts, what are we to think either of Moses or of God? Is it not better to hav a godless world than such a God? But our common sense teaches us that it is not history, but a romance for a purpose, a priestly fiction, which reddened subsequent history with rivers of blood needlessly shed.

"What will you put in its place?" I answer that what will take the place of Christianity already exists, so far grown that it only needs standing room. It is republicanism—free to think and speak. It is our common humanity. The gospel of science has set up a simple church of this world which excludes none, cares for all. Its object and aim is to make the best of this life, on the safe assumption that any future one cannot be damaged thereby. This church ignores God only because it is impossible to know him. In this respect it is on a precise level with the Christian church itself, only the latter pretends to know him when it doesn't. The object of reverence where God is ignored is the truth, the beauty, the order, the fitness of things. The rolling orbs, teeming with ever-renewed life, fill the thoughtful soul with awe. The wise, the good, the brave of his own race, naturally excite a homage that exalts every man. It has always been so. The gods hav all been men. And there are modern men, within the knowledge of the living, far higher than any of the ancient gods. When theology and theologians cease from the earth there will be more personal human divinity than ever.

The trouble with Christianity hitherto has been not so much that it shed blood as that it smothered thought. It shortened life some, but life is shortened by many other causes. Its crime has been enslaving the human mind, holding the present in bondage to the past, filling the future with intolerable forebodings, swapping away a world that we hav for one of which we know nothing, diverting natural affections from their natural objects, breeding pauperism at the base of society to support a useless hierarchy at the top, teaching that human salvation comes not from man himself, but from the favor of an arbitrary sovereign through a priesthood.

All enslavers are themselvs enslaved. The hour is striking for the liberation of kings and priests as well as common humanity. Perfect equality before the law, perfect secularity, perfect liberty of thought and speech, does not mean no obligation, no duty, no order, no property, no variety of genius or ability. There are gregarious races, of which the individuals are precisely alike. In the human race no two are so. This variety of form, strength, talent, taste, and disposition is what tends to the perfection of human society. For every one of the thousands of labors and arts that minister to human needs and enjoyments, there are those naturally fitted. When every one is free to do what he can do best, and is made sure of the fruit of his own labor, whether of hand or brain, when no class, by its privileges, livs at the expense of another, or extorts benefits without rendering an equivalent, mankind will be as well off here, and as well prepared for hereafter, without Christianity as with it.

Freethinkers are not free from thought, but free in it. Whatever they believe or don't believe, they hav no animosity against facts, duties, natural obligations, or anything which binds human society together in one harmonious whole. They cheerfully accord to the great body of Christians the credit of being far better than their creeds or theological dogmas. And when the churches, as such, insist on having their property taxed equally with all other property, they will accord them such credit for sincerity as is at present impossible.

Wisdom, whether it is the gift of matter or mind, is never thrown away on man or beast. "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself," says the ancient proverb. And it adds with equal truth, what theology denies, the converse, "But if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." Wisdom lies in making the powers of nature tributary to one's highest and most permanent pleasure, and the highest and most permanent pleasure comes from contributing as far as possible to the highest and most permanent pleasure of others. Nature is made tributary to man only by co-operation of labor, of mind, and muscle; but mind nowhere amounts to anything in this world without muscle.

In the reign of folly, which has hitherto prevailed so deplorably, mind and muscle hav scorned each other, to the injury of both. On one side labor has been held in contempt as dishonorable, and on the other deplored as a curse. But it is both an honor and a blessing, whether by mind or muscle, or both together. There is no other honor and no other blessedness, and no other possible ground of self-respect. The most exalted and honorable of all individuals is he who exerts all such qualities as he has to make all wisely-directed labor as honorable and effectiv as possible. There is not a man in existence who can afford to despise or cheat the humblest hod-carrier—if he carries the hod faithfully and does not spill the mortar. There is not a woman, though she be a goddess Minerva, who can afford to harbor a thought of contempt for the sister woman who washes her china without breaking it.

Society exists to-day with such happiness as it has because, with comparativly small exception, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the workers with mind and the workers with muscle, are mutually grateful to each other. There is reason for this gratitude in their mutual dependence. It is the ignorance of this great, inevitable fact, no denser with the poor than the rich, with the laborers than with the capitalists, that makes all the danger there is for the future. The wisdom of universal common school education lies in this, that by educating the children of all classes together this fundamental and vital fact of human sociology may be impressed upon every intellect and every heart. After this has been done there will be no such thing as poverty to speak of—at any rate, no one with mind and muscle enough to do useful work will hav any poverty to complain of.

Terrible poverty, in spite of all modern improvements, still exists, because not only the poor steal from the rich, but the rich steal perhaps ten times as much from the poor.

After nearly two thousand years of Christianity the world wants justice more than it wants mercy.

Striving for Harmony.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Dear Sir: At the Freethinkers' Convention, held at Hornellsville last week, steps were taken that I hope may result in bringing together into the National Liberal League all the friends of state secularization in this country. And surely such a result would bring joy to every patriotic heart that desires to see our government placed where the fathers intended it should be, on the firm basis of the entire separation of church and state.

The resolutions passed at the Freethinkers' Convention provide that if the National Liberal League at its coming Congress shall adopt the resolutions passed by the Freethinkers' Convention in 1878, then the officers of the New York State Association are authorized and requested to take out a charter for the Association as an auxiliary Liberal League. I consider that a great step toward union. Of course it is not all that those known as "modifiers" would like, but I think they should be willing to join on that basis. Those resolutions concede that the United States Comstock laws are unconstitutional, and it seems to me that as they hav been construed by the courts in the Heywood and Bennett cases, they do come in conflict with that part of the Constitution that provides for the freedom of speech and of the press.

These resolutions do not call for the entire repeal of the present laws, much less for the repeal of all laws against the circulation of obscene literature, but they require "that any laws found on the statute books of either the general or state governments that enable any person to arrest and punish other citizens for the honest expression of their opinions on questions relating to religion, morals, or science should be at once repealed." I cannot see how any Liberal can object to that. There is where "repealer" and "modifier" can come together.

And then these resolutions provide that the state Comstock laws should "be repealed or radically modified." That brings our friends to an agreement again.

Then upon the following statement, which we find in those resolutions, we will all concur: "That the Liberal cause is the cause of knowledge, liberty, and purity, which are the best guarantees of each other, and that this Convention hereby emphatically puts itself upon record as in no sense sympathizing with, but as holding in severe reprobation, those who seek, by the circulation through the mails or otherwise of literature of an obscene spirit and character, to corrupt, debauch, and influence the public, and especially youthful minds, and it hereby declares its emphatic approval of the use of all such means as may be within the legitimate scope of the government to secure the repression of the issue and circulation of such matter by the press."

On those resolutions I am willing to stand and work for the Liberal League movement, and I predict that their adoption by the coming Congress will bring to your ranks large numbers of those who heretofore hav not connected themselvs with the League movement, and also will satisfy our friends known as "modifiers," so that they will return to their first love.

I hav learned by experience that Liberals are a hard class to organize. Each has his hobby or idea that he thinks important and must not be sacrificed. For that reason, if we would build up a great organization we must stick close to the fundamental principles of our organization. I think there is no Liberal in America but believes in the platform of the League, as the League, restated by Hon. Elizur Wright, President of the League, in his call for the next Congress at Chicago on the 30th of September, viz. (1) in the entire separation of church and state; (2) in the protection of all citizens in their equal religious and political rights; (3) in the universal secular education of the people. But when we come to details to state our specific views we find we differ. There differences must be allowed, tolerated, or compromised. We must certainly avoid the appearance of laying down, as to other matters, anything like a creed as a test of fellowship.

Since the organization of the League at Philadelphia we hav had some bitter controversies, and some bad blood has been engendered in our ranks. We must forget those controversies and purify that blood and all go in for reconciliation. If we hav combativ natures that must find vent, let them be satisfied by warring against our common enemy, the Christian superstition and its interference in state and secular affairs. We hav enough of that kind of work to do to gratify that propensity.

I believe if the coming Congress shall be guided by patriotism and wisdom, and by a desire to unite all our forces in one great army that shall fight for liberty and purity, it will make the Liberal League movement one that will command the respect and admiration of all true Americans. Thousands will look to you and the other leaders of the present organization to so conduct the proceedings of the next Congress as to make the League movement a grand success.

I thank you for the cordial invitation that has been extended to me to be present at the coming Congress. I fear unavoidable obstacles will prevent me from accepting of the invitation, but I shall watch the proceedings with great interest.

Fraternally yours, H. L. GREEN.

Salamanca, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1881.

DEAR MR. GREEN: Your favor of the 10th inst. can hav but one reply from me—I concur.

I hav always felt that the dissentions you refer to never grew out of any real difference of principle, or policy, or as to our true work to be done. They seemed to me to be chiefly differences of politics, education, and culture inflamed, unconsciously perhaps, by personal and editorial interests, rivalry, and pride. If we are true Liberals time will let these unworthy motivs fall away from us, and will find us united in one great work of defense and secular education. But as the clouds clear up we must all unite in three cheers for our noble President, HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, who has brought us through the storm with our FLAG OF LIBERTY unstained by defeat or compromise.

LIBERTY is our birthright; when that is sold or betrayed all is lost. That is the jewel of the soul the League must be ever ready to fight for and conserve.

Other matters, such as the "punishment of offenses," are important too, but they can be secured at any time, and must be harmonized with the great purpose of the Constitution "to preserve the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and our posterity."

There seems to be a notion that in sustaining liberty the League has taken some new extreme, illegal, immoral, impracticable, absurd, unusual, or "disrespectable" grounds or views. There is no foundation for this notion. It has simply maintained the old landmarks of liberty amid a storm of unmerited and insincere abuse, which those who hurled ought to die soon or learn to be ashamed of. Still such reports lead to no little misapprehension and harm.

For instance, even you in your letter seem to suppose that the League has taken the ground, or would take the ground, that the Comstock United States postal laws are unconstitutional. It might seem absurd to ask the League or the people at large to pass upon such a question of constitutional law against the United States Supreme Court. But the League has never done anything of the kind. It has simply said in giving its reasons why it thought those laws had better be repealed, "That in the view of many whose judgment we respect such laws are unconstitutional."

That is all it has ever said—and is not that true and reasonable? Certainly many of our ablest lawyers, statesmen, and editors, and thousands of our people hav protested against the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Jackson case as the Republicans did against its decision in the Dred Scott case, and for a similar reason, that it strikes down the Constitution as a bulwark of liberty. It seemed proper to mention this belief as one ground why those laws should be repealed, but the League has done nothing more. It does not, as you seem to suppose, ask its members to share that belief. People who believe those laws to be constitutional are as eligible to the League as those who believe with Mr. Wright or myself, or, as I believe, yourself, on that subject. It is a matter of legal or political opinion about which there is not and never has been any declaration or test whatever.

Truth is slow in catching a lie, but when you hear an objection of this kind to the League I pray you to refer to its record and see if it has any ground. If your friends would only read the fifth and sixth resolutions of its last Congress, cited in my speech "Liberty and Purity," most if not all of their objections would fall at once.

But these questions hav now, for all I see, passed out of the League to the legislatures and the people. I see no reason for reviving them in any League Congress again.

Let us, then, all join our President and Mr. Chainey in making the League henceforth a power for the THREE great purposes stated in your letter, and above all for the last, which our country needs more than all, the secular education of the people.

Yours sincerely, T. B. WAKEMAN.

A Terrific Explosion of Dynamite in the Old City of Pittsburg.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Liberal League of this city is one of the most enterprising in the country. It holds its meetings regularly every Sunday after a vacation during the hot months, keeps up discussions of interesting subjects, and manages its financial affairs with so much prudence as always to keep even with the world. Although Pittsburg is one of the very worst cities in the Union for crimes of all kinds, it is also the most orthodox in religion, the two P's, poperv and Presbyterianism, being in the ascendant. The Liberal League is a light shining in a dark place, and its members keep it constantly replenished with oil. It goes in really for free discussion, and invites clergymen of the most orthodox stamp to address the members, as well as lecturers who coincide with them in opinion.

On the first Sunday of this month, in accordance with an invitation extended to her, Mrs. Jane G. Swisshelm gave them a lecture on "What is Christianity?" in which she exploded the pretensions of the church and of the apostle Paul in the most terrific style. It reminds me of the havoc made by the French and English armies on the famous fortress called the Malakoff, which the Russians supposed was invulnerable, but which, soon after the siege began, replied so faintly as to show that it was ready to surrender. Mrs. Swisshelm is a lady of national reputation as a thinker and writer. She was born and brought up a Covenanter, the straightest-laced of all the Protestant sects. It was known that in following Christ she felt it her duty to differ with the church, but the public little dreamed of the extent to which her defection from orthodoxy had extended. Everybody, however, knows now, for the Despatch and the Commercial, the two leading daily papers of Pittsburg, gave the address in full the next day after its delivery, and it has had a reading which even Col. Ingersoll could not command. The clergy, dumbfounded and terror-stricken, and utterly unable to say a word of defense, hav hid their little selvs in their coward's castles, called their pulpits, and fire off their harmless little popguns against the bugaboo "Infidelity;" but Mrs. Swisshelm, by her bold and logical attack upon the sham religion of the churches, has set multitudes to thinking on the subject, and many hav expressed the wish to know the steps, from the first to the last, by which so remarkable a woman found her way out of the Egyptian darkness and bondage of the densest Presbyterianism into the light and liberty of Radicalism.

I think, Mr. Editor, you could not render a more important service to the cause for which THE TRUTH SEEKER was founded than to republish Mrs. Swisshelm's address. Her high character in all that makes up the intelligent and good woman would lead thousands of persons to read with deep interest the thoughts she has expressed in it, and to wonder at the ability and courage she has displayed in giving such an utterance in such a city as Pittsburg.

DAVID JONES.

Pittsburg, Pa., Sept. 10, 1881.

Elmina's Request.

TO THE READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hav just received from good old Bro. Hacker "Bracing Rhymes for the Times." They are cute, clever, and true, and I hope you will order them by the dozen, or hundreds, and scatter them broadcast among your believing neighbors. They are eye-openers and splendid for tracts. An old man who is crippled with rheumatism and has given his best days for the good of humanity, and has no other means of support, sends out these rhymes hoping you will send him "dollars and dimes" to furnish himself and aged wife a few of the necessaries of life, while he givs you the ripened thoughts of a radical, laborious, and useful existence.

Be sure, every one of you, to send at least ten cents for specimens which once read will pave the way for large orders. Mr. Hacker was one of Elmina's first gods, and many a seed sown by his "Pleasure Boat," has grown into a large and flourishing tree of radicalism. Address Jeremiah Hacker, Berlin, N. J.

The Fifth Annual League Congress.

For the fifth time the organized Liberals of the United States are about to meet by delegation in their Annual Congress. These congresses hav been a marked feature in the clash of public opinion, since they were started. Every succeeding one has been of greater interest, and has made its mark in the history of the republic.

The Liberals of the United States hav succeeded to the radicalism, the persistence, the conscience of the old Abolitionist party. They are the conscience party of to-day. Wherever they mount the platform, there bed-rock principles are discussed and insisted on, down to the bottom. Wherever they assemble in convention, there the conflict is fiercest; and woe be to any opponent, or even any half friend, who enters that arena not duly armed and equipped as the law of logic directs. The javelins of justice hurled by the force of intellect are sure to find any crevice in his cuirass, and down he goes hors de combat.

The lights of the Liberal party will be on hand at Chicago this year as heretofore, and there will be the usual flash of wit and blaze of eloquence. Interesting questions will come up for debate, and they will be debated as nowhere else. The working stagers who were at Chicago last year will be there again, with new ones added. Mr. E. C. Walker, F. F. Follett, W. W. Hall, George Lynn, Mrs. Maria Follett, Mrs. Dr. Severance, Mrs. H. S. Lake, and Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel will be on hand, and speak for the Mississippi Valley and the West. We hope some strong-bodied and able-minded Liberals may appear from the Pacific coast. Elizur Wright, J. P. Mendum, George Chainey, James Parton, T. B. Wakeman, Prof. Rawson, C. Palmer, and J. S. Verity will be there to represent the Atlantic states. The Liberals everywhere are invited to attend, and if they don't, they will miss a great occasion.

At Chicago the Brevoort House, on the American plan, with a good restaurant in the basement, will accommodate guests on the same terms as last year—seventy-five cents and one dollar per day. It is situated on Madison street near LaSalle, and only a few steps from Hershey Hall.

The Liberals in the League and out of it must be aware that the holding of a congress in a great city costs something. Halls hav to be paid for, and some advertising done, and the convention ought to be reported and the proceedings printed and preserved. The expenses of the working officers hav to be paid, and some of the speakers ought to be. Besides, we wish something left in the treasury after the congress to commence an activ next year's work. The very Rev. Jo Cook ridiculed us one year because we reported only $200 left over in the treasury. Don't let us incur Jo's satire and our own bankruptcy by letting that happen again. Send in contributions or communications to the national secretary, 201 East 71st street, New York, as usual, except near and at the time of the congress; then address him, Brevoort House, Chicago. T. C. LELAND, Sec. N. L. L.

WE recently noticed, with some trembling of conscience, the efforts of the Right Rev. Bishop Wingfield, of Benecia, to raise a fund for the conversion of the Jews. The bishop is well and honorably known in California, and we hope the same thing may be said of him in heaven—when he gets there. He is venerable in years and, we trust, in piety. His life is consecrated to the salvation of his fellow-man and especially to his Jewish fellow-man—if he can only raise the coin for his conversion. This is a noble ambition of the bishop, but, alas! it is a mercenary one. Why cannot the bishop convert the Jews without begging money of the Christians? You cannot convert the Jews by showering money upon them. They hav no love for money; you know to them it is really "the root of all evil"—in a horn. The bishop is gravely mistaken if he thinks he can convert a single Jew through the influence of "filthy lucre." The reverend gentleman might be successful in giving a Jew a free pass to heaven or a season ticket to the opera, which is about the same thing, but a check or draft on the Bank of California for $100,000 would be spurned if the condition were that the Jew should change—the color of his skin. We hav this to say to the venerable bishop: If he collects any coin from dupes and can spare it he had better apply the sum total to the reformation of the 447 Christian ministers who hav fallen from grace. If he wishes the particulars regarding these saintly shepherds he can get them in detail from M. E. Billings, who has published a book of their sins. The author of the book says that his collection is by no means complete, but he has already enough, in our opinion, to call for any spare change Bishop Wingfield may hav for the conversion of the Jews.—Jewish Times.

the thing had been rather common for a thousand years or more before his debut in the world, and a small number of cases are said to have taken place since. The Chinese demi-god Yu is said to have been begotten upon a human virgin by divinity in person; Christna had the same origin, the god Vishnu having a private and very interesting interview with Christna's virgin mother Devanaguy; Genghis Khan has a similar story told of him; Buddha was begotten of the virgin Maia by a ray from heaven, which, of course, could have been no less than God himself; Rama was another divinely-begotten son of Vishnu, and he came as a mediator or an atoner for the wickedness of men; and so far as old Jupiter is concerned, he far excelled, and at a much earlier date, the exploits of the Jewish Yahweh in the matter of begetting children on the persons of young and pretty females of the earth; among the sons of old Jove may be named Mercury, Esculapius, Hercules, Bacchus, Castor, Pollux, Perseus, etc., and quite a goodly portion of these were begotten by him on the persons of young ladies for whom he took a burning fancy. Of the mythologies of the begetting of demigods I need not now speak, as it would swell my letter to very full proportions; but I will mention Plato of Greece, a great writer and thinker, who lived nearly 500 B. C.; Spensippus, the son of Plato's sister, and Elarchus the sophist; and Amaxilides, in the second book of his philosophy, affirms as to the begetting of Plato, that his mother Perictione, having connection with the shadow of Apollo, conceived, and thus was enabled to bring into the world him who proved to be the prince of philosophers. No Christian ought to doubt this remarkable begetting of Plato, for Plato really lived; he himself wrote most excellent works, and his beautiful morals and teachings which have been handed down to us, and the story of his miraculous paternity is at least three times as well proved as that of Jesus, of whose very existence there is the gravest doubt, and of whose divine paternity we have the statement of an unknown person that the old man Joseph, the carpenter, discovered it; but this unknown person did not write it till more than a hundred and fifty years after Joseph was dead, and long after everybody else had passed away who lived at the time.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO 51.

560. I don't believe that the book of Judges was written by either of the judges who ruled over Israel, or by any one who lived at the time. It is clearly anonymous and unauthentic. In the first chapter it speaks of Jerusalem and the Israelites dwelling there, when it was not taken by the Israelites till the time of David, some three hundred years later, nor was it called Jerusalem until after it was occupied by the Jews. Before that it was called Jebus or Jebusi. This is proof conclusive that the book was not written till after the time of David.

561. I no more believe that the two books of Samuel were written by him whose name they bear, and for the same reason—they mention events which could not have occurred till after Samuel's death. For instance, the account of his being raised from the dead by the Witch of Endor could hardly have been written by him any more than the account of the death and burial of Moses could have been written by Moses. Men are not apt to do so much writing after they are dead and buried. The second book of Samuel gives accounts of events up to the close of the reign of David, who outlived Samuel some forty years. No one is justified in thinking Samuel a smart enough man to write up what took place after he had moldered into dust.

562. I don't believe anybody knows who wrote the two books of Kings, or that there is the slightest proof that they were written by inspiration. They are entirely made up of narratives which any person of moderate ability could write in they were familiar with the transpiration of the events, or which they could easily imagine were it necessary to draw upon the imagination for the sake of a startling recital. The second book ends with the Babylonian captivity, and it is thought by good judges that the books were not written till the Babylonian captivity or afterward, as probably was the case with the larger share of the books of the Old Testament. It is highly probable that very few of them, save the older prophecies, were in existence when the Israelites were taken away captive to Babylon.

563. I don't believe any person knows who wrote the Chronicles, or that they were penned by an inspired writer. Neither does anybody know when they were written. Some excellent judges think they were not written till 250 B.C., which is very probably the case. They go over much the same ground as the two books of Kings, leaving many statements in those books, and containing some extravagant ones not in the others. They contain many highly improbable statements, and add nothing to help the reliability of the books of the Kings; in fact, they are without value.

564. I do not believe the books of Ezra and Nehemiah to be any more reliable or any more inspired than the Chronicles. They are indeed supposed to have been written by the same hand. In fact, the last two verses of Chronicles and the first three of Ezra are the same. There is a confusion between them and amongst them that is hard to reconcile with a divine origin. It is not at all likely that they were written before 250 or 300 years before our era, and not till about as many years had elapsed from the time the events named occurred. There are some discrepancies between the books of Ezra and Nehemiah well enough to notice. They agree that twelve thousand Israelites returned from Babylon to Jerusalem, but in adding up the items to make the sum total Ezra's only amounts to 29,818—12,542 less than the number claimed, while Nehemiah's items make 31,089, or only 11,271 out of the way. Such incorrectness will hardly answer to attribute to a God of infinite truth and perfection,

565. I do not deny that the little book of Ruth, which we passed by, is a very pretty little love-story—told just tolerably well—about a Moabitish girl who was in love with her cousin Boaz, and about her slyly crawling into bed with him after dark and leaving before daylight in the morning. The story was not written till several hundred years after the time when the event is located, and as it narrates an amorous circumstance, similar to what has occurred thousands of times in the world, it does not seem to be necessary for a person to be inspired to write it; and what necessity there was for placing it in the Hebrew canon it is hard to decide.

566. The book of Esther is still more objectionable, being little more than a story of the prostitution of a Jewish maiden to the passions of a drunken king, who put away his wife because she had the good sense to be disgusted at his shameful conduct and to refuse to be made a foolish show of in a drunken debauch. Dr. Davidson showed his good sense in deciding that the book is unfit to have a place in the Jewish canon. It is unquestionably the merest fiction, and was probably written in Persia some 250 years before our era. I cannot think it just to send persons to an endless hell for not being able to think Esther was a strictly virtuous woman, or that the book of her doings is the inspired word of heaven.

567. I don't believe that the book of Job was written by a Hebrew, or that it was necessarily penned by a hand directed by heaven. True, it is one of the grandest and sublimest books between the lids of the Bible, but that does not prove that it was inspired by the God of the Jews, nor that it is not a drama or poem which a man of talent would be capable of penning. In incidents, names of places, and persons it has no connection with any other part of the Bible. It is a series of dialogues purporting to have been held between God and five other persons. The drama opens by God and Satan holding a conversation and entering into a compact to trouble and greatly annoy a good and just man by the name of Job, and the way in which the poor man was shamefully used, both in person and property, stamps the whole transaction as the most shabby and discreditable one which god or devil was ever engaged in. It was certainly unhandsome in God to turn over so just a man to the sport and cruelties of his worst enemy, and it assuredly was the worst act ever charged upon the devil that he should show such cruelty and injustice. Some amends are attempted to be made by God or the devil, or both in concert, after tormenting and afflicting poor Job to within an inch of his life, in bestowing upon him a double quantity of all the treasures he had before possessed and other seven sons and three daughters, 14,000 sheep, 6,000 camels, 1,000 yoke of oxen, and 1,000 she asses. This is the only instance where Satan is introduced in the Old Testament, and that he is here merely a fictitious character is quite clear. The first and last parts of the drama are thought to have been added to the main story after being written, as was also the part played by Elihu. But one thing is very certain; no one knows by whom it was written, when it was written, where it was written, or why it was written. It is probably just about as much entitled to the claim of being divinely inspired as the productions of such writers as Dean Swift, Defoe, and Charles Dickens.

568. I do not believe it is correct to ascribe the book of Psalms to bloody King David, but that it is true that but a small portion of them were written in his time. They are a collection of religious songs by different authors, very much as songs of various kinds are in our own times. They were undoubtedly a collection made up of different dates, varying from five hundred to one thousand years, the earliest from the latest. Some of them are vindictive and malicious enough to be David's, as they might have been written by a Nero or a Charlemagne, but it is quite presumable that David was too much engaged in his forays, freebooting expeditions, wars, massacres, and slaughterings, as well as with his many wives and concubines, the getting of other men's wives, and all that, to take up his time in writing pious songs. The avocations are too dissimilar for me to believe they could all have been performed by one and the same person. Kuenen, the learned German Bible scholar, sensibly says, "We cannot safely predicate a single psalm that was written by David, and the chances are that not a single one was written by him." In this position Chadwick fully agrees with him, and says the conclusion is a thousand times more reasonable than the opposite. Twelve of the Psalms are ascribed to Asaph, eleven to the sons of Korah, two to Solomon, and one to Moses. Had they been ascribed to fucius, Buddha, Apollo, or Thomas a Kempis it would have been just as correct. There are no proofs that the credits are in the slightest degree correct. The 137th Psalm, which speaks of the captivity in Babylon, assuredly could not have been written by David, unless like Moses, Joshua, and Samuel, he was able to describe what took place long after his death. The ablest critics think that a considerable portion of them were written as late as the time of the Maccabees, 150 B. C. Some of the Psalms have been broken in two, some made up of fragments, and some have been perverted from the purpose for which they were originally designed. The fourteenth Psalm is a duplicate of the fifty-third, and parts of various psalms appear in various others. It is preposterous to suppose that the infinite creator of the universe had aught to do with them.

569. There is no proof that the book of Proverbs was written by Solomon, or that it was directed by the infinite one any more than the proverbs of the Turks, the Spaniards, or those which appeared in poor Richard's almanac. There is a bare possibility that Solomon may have been the author of some of them, but it is only a possibility, and the probabilities are in the other direction. Who can believe that a sensual libertine with his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines would have spent any portion of his time in writing homilies on purity, chastity, and morality, as the first nine chapters are? Who could imagine that such a man as Solomon would write enjoining others to sexual continence? The chapters x to xxii are made up from fragments from different sources, and others, again, make up to chapter xxx. The latter chapter begins: "The words of Agur, the son of Jakeh." Whether Agur was Jew or Gentile does not appear, but it is quite safe to conclude he was the latter, as those names are not mentioned by any other writer in the Bible. The last chapter begins with, "The words of King Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him." As the Israelites never had a king Lemuel, the only conclusion to be arrived at is that the chapter under consideration is of Gentile origin, as is doubtless a large share of the collection. They were probably not collected till after the return from Babylon, and are the gatherings from various nations and times, the same as with our proverbs and "old saws" of our own time. It is quite unnecessary to attribute them to the lecherous Solomon, or to the dictation of the God of infinite wisdom.

570. I cannot think there is much more probability of Solomon having been the author of Ecclesiastes than of the Proverbs. They are a set of gloomy, sad thoughts probably written by some unknown person who wished to obtain a reputation for his production by giving the name of a distinguished character to them like Solomon; the same has been done in thousands of instances since and probably before. It is hardly reasonable to suppose that Solomon would have written of himself in this way, "I, the preacher, was king over Jerusalem," unless it was written after he had died. And was it a mark of wisdom in him to say, "I have gotten more wisdom than all that were before me?" It would rather be a mark of vanity. The person who thus wrote and wished to have it pass as the words of Solomon played his part badly. There is some diversity of opinion as to the period when the book under consideration was written; Ewald and Davidson say 325 B. C., or seven hundred years after Solomon ascended the throne of Israel. Kuenen, Oort, and others make it a century later, or 225 B. C., 800 years after the time of Solomon. The very least that can be said is that it was not written by Solomon, and whoever the writer was there is no possible way of knowing. Probably it was some misanthropic priest who wished to honor his questionable production with the name of a great king.

571. I do not believe that what is called the Song of Solomon, or Canticles, is any more the writings of Solomon than the two books just considered. It is an amorous oriental drama or poem, and has about as much connection with Hebrew scriptures as would one of the fairy tales of the Arabian Nights Entertainment. The supposition that it had any reference to Christ and the church, as the translaters took the liberty to insinuate, is most preposterous.

572. We now come to the Prophecies, sixteen in number. They are probably less apocryphal than any others of the books of the Old Testament, for some of them are believed to have been written by the persons whose names they bear. Isaiah, however, was written by two or more persons, and at periods of two hundred years or more apart, and herein is portrayed the carelessness that is evinced in the compilation of the Hebrew canon; the writings of different persons not living within two hundred years of each other are thrown together and called the writings of one man, and he under the immediate direction of heaven; and this is the way in which God's word has been fixed up for him. The fore part of the book was written long before the captivity took place. The chronological arrangements of the book is also at fault. While it stauds first in order, it should have been fourth. The style of Isaiah is grander and more elevated than the other prophets, but he is often very incoherent, wild, discordant, and erratic, and often without sense or meaning. The prophets were evidently much less thought of before the era of Christianity than since. Isaiah and Jeremiah are the only two out of the sixteen mentioned by the writers of Kings and Chronicles. Had they been considered of much consequence their names at least would have been mentioned. The chronology, as given in the marginal notes of the Bible, claims that it was written 712 B. C., but the following passage: "Thus saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure; even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built, and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid; thus saith the Lord to his anointed to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations before him, and I will loose the loins of kings to open before him the two paved gates, and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee," etc., could not have been written till after the captivity, when the Jews were under the power of Cyrus, and it was desired that Jerusalem and the temple be rebuilt. To pretend that the original Isaiah wrote those words is the sheerest nonsense and imposition. The later Isaiah, who wrote nearly half the book as it is called, is by the critics called the Great Unknown, or the Deutro-Isaiah, and who lived nearly two hundred years later than the older Isaiah. Both the Isaiahs may have had a fondness for predicting future events, but they were not extremely successful in their hits. Those passages which are held to refer to the coming of Jesus, or the Messiah, do not, upon examination, make the claim good. I do not believe that one of them points to Jesus with any accuracy. Most of the predictions of a coming Messiah are by the Deutro, or false Isaiah, and are not Messianic at all. It is the true Israel that is described—those Jews who, during their captivity, were faithful to their religion. A vast amount of deception and absolute falsehood has been used in connection with the prophecies attributed to Isaiah.

Letters from Friends.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The most important lesson that Liberals hav to learn is to agree to disagree upon many questions that are very closely connected with the fundamental principles that they all profess. When they hav thoroughly learned this lesson they will be prepared to revolutionize the world. They cannot succeed without organization, and they cannot perfect a great organization without compromise. And that word "compromise" will throw almost any ordinary radical into convulsions.

There are a few things upon which Liberals of all shades agree in this country.

First, they agree that ignorance and superstition are the bane of the world, and what humanity needs most is freedom, light, and knowledge.

Second, they agree that there should be an entire separation of the state and what is known as the church or religious institutions.

I hav never come across a person who professed to be a Liberal who would not readily assent to these two propositions. But when you get beyond these statements, and take up questions closely connected with them, you will find an honest difference of opinion existing. Now from the first my idea has been that we organize on these two or three statements upon which there is no disagreement, and cordially allow members to disagree upon the minor questions. And I can't understand how we can perfect a great, powerful organization in any other manner.

When the Syracuse Liberal League Congress was called Mr. Abbot laid down a certain platform known as "the modification of the Comstock laws," and declared that unless that platform was adopted he would withdraw or would not hold office in the League.

Although before that time I had been a great admirer of Mr. Abbot, I could not go with him in the course he took. I said such a platiorm would be unjust to those members who honestly believed the laws should be repealed. My position was that both parties should be allowed to hold to their own special opinions on that subject and kindly work together.

At Chicago last year the "total repealers" insisted on putting their peculiar views into the platform. Col. Ingersoll and others asserted that if the total repeal of the Comstock laws was made the platform of the League they could not remain in it and would be compelled to withdraw. I felt then, and I think now, that the passage of these resolutions was unjust to the friends of state secularization who were not for repeal, and I felt it my duty to withdraw from the League and leave with the minority.

The next Liberal League Congress is to meet in Chicago in a few days, and I can't giv up the idea but what such wise action may be taken there that all friends of state secularization may unite in the National Liberal League organization. But from indications that hav appeared recently, since the Hornellsville Convention, I fear there are a few Liberals who are determined not to work with the National Liberal League unless the League will come entirely to their position. I was in hopes we might all unite on the platform adopted by the Freethinkers' Convention in 1878. I think myself in that platform the "repealers" hav a little the advantage, but as they appear to be in the majority it may be best that it is so.

One party demands that the Comstock laws be "repealed," while the other party demands that these laws be only "modified." I think if the present platform could be changed so as to read "that we demand that the Comstock laws be repealed or radically modified, to the end that the liberty of speech and of the press be preserved," it ought to satisfy both parties.

But if it be impossible to wholly unite all the Liberals of this country in one great, grand organization, then let every party and division work on in their own way without warring with the other divisions.

There is no party in the Liberal ranks but can accomplish great good in their own way. If Col. Ingersoll has come to the conclusion that he cannot unite with any of the various Liberal parties or societies, then let him go forward alone in the magnificent work he has been doing for years—educating the great body of the people into the philosophy of Liberalism. Every Liberal in the world is proud to know that we hav such an eloquent advocate for our cause as Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

If the Free Religionists do not see their way clear to unite with other Liberals in the great work we are interested in, then let us all bid them good cheer in the splendid work they are accomplishing with their acknowledged culture and ability for Freethought.

If some of our Spiritual friends think they hav a special work to do that requires them to stand aloof from Liberal organizations of secular or Freethought character, then let them do so, and let us all gratefully admit the good work this large and intelligent body of Liberals has done in liberating people from the thraldom of orthodoxy. And if it must be that "modifiers" and "repealers" cannot work together in the same organization, then let them work apart in friendship. Last fall I was in hopes that those known as "modifiers" would succeed in perfecting an organization at the Grand Pacific in Chicago, for it then seemed that there was need of two organizations, and there certainly was work enough for each.

And may I be permitted to say that we could advance our cause much faster by giving material aid to our Liberal press than we can by finding fault with it. There is a variety of Liberal papers, and not one but what is doing good. Let every Liberal aid the paper he likes best, and, if I may be allowed to trespass on very dangerous grounds, I would say that our Liberal editors can accomplish much more for Liberalism by fighting our common enemy than by fighting one another. And above all, friends, if we cannot hav everything our own way let us not get disgusted and giv up the good work. The worst charge that I can bring against Mr. Francis E. Abbot, who a few years ago was the earnest leader of the Liberal League movement, is that when he could not hav his own way he retired from service. I never had such faith in any one man as I had in Mr. Abbot, but I learn with regret that he had not that very requisit characteristic for a good warrior—the capacity to bear defeat with resignation and turn it into a victory for the cause. Friends everywhere, let us cease our domestic bickerings; learn to tolerate each other's peculiar views, close up our ranks, and march on to victory.

H. L. GREEN.

PORTLAND, OR., Sept. 9, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am on the warpath in this great northwest spreading the gospel of nature. The country is alive with the great railroad boom which has reached this far-off land at last. Hav spoken from four to six nights at Walla Walla, Dayton, Waisburg, Milton, Pendleton, The Dalles, and am now giving a course of six lectures at Portland. The Liberals hav a fine society here under the direction of C. Beal, a prominent lawyer of this city, and it promises to be permanent. They hav $20,000 subscribed toward the building of a fine hall, to cost $30,000. God speed the Portland Liberals in the good work.

I spoke three nights at Hepner, a small town sixty-three miles from The Dalles, in eastern Oregon, in the midst of the great sheep county. There had never been a Liberal lecture, and, so far as I could ascertain, not a Liberal paper or Infidel book, in the town. The Christian pagans had it all their own way. We turned loose the Gattling-gun three nights, and when we came to bag the game we found we had made a host of friends, and, what is better for the cause, received six subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, with back numbers, if any, containing Bennett's trip letters round the world.

I go from here to Dallas, Salem, Scio, Albany, Brownsville, Eugene, Roseburg, Jacksonville, Ashland, Red Bluff, Checo, to San Jose, my home, where I hope to be once more in November. I hope the Liberals at the above points will pick their flints and get ready for a short season of labor, not prayer, when I reach them. Those who win must work.

Yours truly, J. L. YORK.

CRAB ORCHARD, NEB., Sep. 7, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: While thousands of other old soldiers are going to the capital of Nebrasks to attend the reunion, where they expect to hav a grand, good time, and spend their surplus cash for truck, trinkets, and trash, I remain at home and write you this letter, inclosing money order for six dollars and a half—my surplus cash—five of which is to help the grand old editor swing around the circle for the mutual good of all, and the remainder is to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER to Jan. 1, 1882. In doing this, however, a selfish motiv may be lurking at the bottom, as I expect shortly to receive in return "a thing of beauty and a joy forever," and as time passes its loveliness increases, and just here is where my pleasure is expected to come in.

For twenty years I hav been in the minority, on the side of truth, and it does not require any great stretch of imagination to perceive the ups and downs of an isolated Freethinker in this truly Christian country, but truth is mighty, and although it has been incessantly contending from the most remote ages against a great and diametrically opposit power, it will finally prevail over error. The long duration of this struggle has been marked by alternations of success at times when circumstances seemed very unfavorable. Truth has risen like a victorious chief, proclaiming to the rejoicing millions its triumph over its fallen foe by flinging to the breeze its glorious banner. Civilization and truth go hand in hand, and thus is strength, rigor, earnestness, efficiency imparted to the progress of improvement.

Whatever structure we may erect, to be substantial, worthy of our admiration and respect, must hav truth for its foundation.

Error has left its corroding and subverting imprint on the records of the past, giving melancholy evidence of its triumph in the destruction of thrones, powers, principalities, and republics, with only a few shattered columns as the silent remains of their pride and glory. But let us turn from the contemplation of these unpleasant scenes to some brighter theme which truth inspired and which is still cherished for its beneficial results. Galileo stood alone in the seventeenth century, rejecting the sophistry of ancient philosophers and conclusivly demonstrating the revolution of the earth with other planets around the sun. Political and religious prejudices had till then clustered around the Ptolemaic system of philosophy, and to reject this ancient doctrin was heresy, those who dared to maintain new doctrins being subjected to inquisitorial torment and death, but Galileo felt the force of this great fact within his brain, and notwithstanding his forced recantation, which had been wrung from him with torture, he was constrained to say, "And yet it moves." There hav been many recurring successes in science, politics, and the moral elevation of mankind since that time, each giving new impulse to the evolutionary march of civilization, and new victories are being continually ascribed to the glorious banner of truth.

Our own government has not yet recovered from the sad effects of the conflict between truth and error, truth having gained one of her grandest victories in the abolition of negro slgvery. There are still other victories to come—the emancipation of woman, and the emancipation of the human mind.

Evolution is written on the grand march of events, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is its grand coadjutor.

MOUNTAIN VIEW, CAL., Aug. 31, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find eight dollars—five for the "Round-the-World" fund, one dollar and a half for "What I Don't Believe, What I Do Believe, Why, and Wherefore," and the balance for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months. Yours, DAVID JENKINS.

MILLSTON, WIS., Aug. 23, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am behind with my mite, but better late than never. I hav got you one name for your books, for which you will find inclosed $5, from my young brother James J. Pierce, which you will send to his address. I must hav the books too, but will hav to wait awhile before sending in the "V." Sent me some posters, and I will try to get some new subscribers. Wishing you a pleasant journey and a safe return, I remain, MRS. JOHN DOTY.

RICHLAND, MICH., Sept. 12, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I was somewhat pained to see in your valuable paper of Aug. 27th the article signed T. Winter, in which he rants against a large class of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with the same spirit of intolerance and bigotry that marks the most orthodox believer. Now, sir, I am a Spiritualist. I hav investigated the subject for more than thirty years, from before the first tiny rap was heard in Hydeville up to the almost perfect materialization of the present day, and now, sir, after all this thought and study, I find myself one of the worst of lunatics and fools which Mr. Winter claims the thanks of all honest men in exposing.

Let us analyze his article somewhat. He starts out by congratulating you upon bringing thousands up out of the slough of superstition to the side of Freethought and at the same time denies me the right and respect due a Freethinker. He says there is no proof that a single life has ever survived the wreck of death. How does he know? Has he proved all things? Has he investigated until there is nothing more to be learned? Is he prepared to say that he possesses all knowledge, and thousands of earnest, candid men and women are fools? Why is his statement that mankind do not liv after leaving this state of existence entitled to more credit than my statement that they do, without he givs us the proof? and he offers us nothing of the kind.

Now, he claims to be the champion Materialist. Well, if Materialism leads one to the hight of impudence and self-conceit manifested in his article, I want none of it. I want to be able to respect the belief and opinion of every honest truth seeker. He says that faith in things non-provable is the faith of fools. Now, sir, he must prove that there is no hereafter for mankind or he stands a self-convicted fool as well as an ignorant, self-conceited bigot. Ignorant when he calls us supernaturalists, self-conceited when he claims to know more than thousands of earnest, honest believers in the Spiritual faith; bigoted as the most intolerant "believe as I do or be damned" orthodox Christian, when he calls another a lunatic or fool for believing different from his high mightiness. Come, Mr. Winter, prove it, and thousands will indeed bless you, or you must stand self-convicted as above.

With love and respect for all humble, honest seekers after knowledge, and especial regard for you and your whole family of truth seekers, with envy and malice toward none, I beg leave to sign myself (if one of the worst of frauds), an earnest, honest truth seeker.

WILLIAM S. LOGAN.

Knowledge of the Unknown.

There is a problem I hav tried to solve
By patient thought, by long research, by guess;
Yet all the more that problem I revolve,
Of its solution still I know the less.

Whence do we come, and whither do we go?
What falls to earth? what soars to reach the sky?
What of ourselvs do any of us know,
Except that we are born, and liv, and die?

What is the meaning of eternity?
Backward and forward is it just the same?
Are we drawn on and on unerringly,
Or sent on to that unknown from which we came?

No answer to such questions can I find
In all the systems that the wise essay;
And when I try to cope with them my mind
Falls back upon itself, and turns away.

And yet I hav a knowledge quite sublime,
A knowledge that I hold without a fear;
That I shall solve the problem in good time,
And day by day that time is drawing near.

Then I, without an effort that is mine,
Inevitably, sure as fated death,
Shall know if I am human or divine,
And if my being ceases with my breath.

Then I, when all things fleshly part and fail,
Shall put the unknown future to the touch,
Shall look, if I can look, beyond the veil,
And evermore know nothing, or know much.

—Edward Willett.

Lines on the Death of Edward John Trelawny.

Last high star of the years whose thunder
Still men's listening remembrance hears,
Last light left of our father's years,
Watched with honor and hailed with wonder,
Thee, too, hav the years borne under,
Thou, too, then hast regained thy peers.

Wings that warred with the winds of morning,
Storm-winds rocking the red great dawn,
Close at last, and a film is drawn
Over the eyes of the storm-bird, scorning
Now no longer the loud wind's warning,
Waves that threaten or waves that fawn.

Peers were none of thee left us living,
Peers of theirs we shall see no more.
Eight years over the full fourscore
Knew thee; now shalt thou sleep, forgiving
All griefs past of the wild world's giving,
Moored at last on the stormless shore.

World-wide liberty's lifelong lover,
Lover no less of the strength of song,
Sea king, swordsman, hater of wrong,
Over thy dust that the dust shall cover
Comes my song as a bird to hover,
Borne of its will as of wings along.

Cherished of thee were this brief song's brothers
Now that follows them, cherishing thee,
Over the tides and the tideless sea
Soft as a smile of the earth our mother's Flies it faster than all those others,
First of the troop at thy tomb to be.

Memories of Greece and the mountain's hollow
Guarded alone of thy loyal sword,
Hold thy name for our hearts in ward;
Yet more fain are our hearts to follow
One way now with the southward swallow
Back to the grave of the man their lord.

Heart of hearts, art thou moved not hearing
Surely, if hearts of the dead may hear,
Whose true heart it is now draws near?
Surely the sense of it thrills thee, cheering
Darkness and death with the news now nearing—
Shelley, Trelawny rejoins thee here.

—A. C. Swinburne in the Athenæum.

A Scottish Clergyman.

[Suggested by Dr. Cunningham's speech in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on "An Educated Ministry."]

My name is Tonald Shaw, and I come from Lochinva,
For my knowledge of ta Greek well known in Embro College;
I am Tonald Shaw, B. D., and ta good Professor B.
Said no student could excel Tonald Shaw in general knowledge.

I've been licensed for three years, and begin to hav my fears
That I've wasted too much time on my college education;
For ta people nowadays chose ta candidate who brays
Like Balaam's ass or roars like ta genuin bulls of Bashan.

My cousin, Shon McCall, who never knew Greek at all,
Was called ta other day to ta parish of Glenheather;
For Shon thumps ta Bible well, and dwells largely upon hell
As ta verra hottest place in ta verra coldest weather.

Though Shon knew no Greek at all when a student at ta hall,
Shon could put ta heavy stone and could throw ta heavy hammer;
He could play ta pipes and sing, and could tance ta Highland fling,
But he was an awful dunce at ta Greek and Hebrew grammar.

I was asked to preach one day in ta parish of Glenstrae,
And I preached a fine discourse, and I made a good impression;
And I thought my chances sure until Dominie McClure
Said Tonald Shaw had doubts about ta Westminster Confession;

That ta great Professor Smuth, who said Moses was a muth,
Thought Tonald would be sure to make a splendid reputation;
That ta learned Doctor Grieff, of all heretics ta chief,
Said, "Shame that Tonald Shaw should not hav a congregation."

So they thought I was not sound, and when election day came round
They chose Shon Grant, who wore ta spotless tie and collar;
Though ta factor of ta laird to ta tenantry declared
They should vote tor Tonald Shaw, ta shentleman and scholar.

But Macleod of Balmaquhair said he did not like long hair,
That I did not preach at all, but pehaved like a play-actor;
And his daughter and his wife said that not in all their life
Had they heard a man like Grant, and they wushed to spite ta factor.

They should all deplore ta day they took patronage away
From ta men of common sense and ta men of education;
But they wushed to dish ta Frees and confound ta great U. P.'s,
And they dished poor Tonald Shaw and ta Zion of ta nation.

For I'm not so verra sure that our Zion is more pure
Than it wass in ta old times when ta patron chose ta pastor;
What a shame that Tonald Shaw should herd sheep in Lochinva;
To lose such men as Tonald is a national disaster.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

READ THIS LIST OF STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15 00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and working dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

Gems of Thought.

IT is impossible for any one to conceive of an "intelligent and omnipotent agency." If I were asked if I believed any being exists that is all head and no body, I should say no, for we cannot conceive of a being that could exist that was all head Omnipotence is just as impossible to our minds as would be a living head and no body. A power or agency that could do all things could controvert every known law of the universe. It could turn the earth backward in its revolution without disturbing a single molecule of its entire substance and appurtenances. It could make fire freeze us and water turn to liquid honey. It could cause trees to grow in mid air, and elephants to climb in their branches. Omnipotence is just as ridiculous a conception as one could well imagin, and the wonder to me is that so many still insist that it is a possible being.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE will is father to the deed, but the thought and sentiment are father and mother of the will. Nothing seems more important than a thought; it has neither hands nor feet, but nothing proves so powerful. The thought turns out a thing; its vice or virtue becomes manners, habits, laws, institutions; the abstraction becomes concrete; the most universal proportion is the most particular; and, in the end, it is the abstract thinker who is the most practical man and sets mills a-running and ships to sail.—Theodore Parker.

THE last resort a man has recourse to, in the conduct of himself, is his understanding; for though we distinguish the faculties of the mind, and giv the supreme command to will, as to an agent, yet the truth is the man who is the agent determins himself to this or that voluntary action, upon some precedent knowledge, or appearance of knowledge, in the understanding.—John Locke.

THERE can be no doubt that acting upon a predeterminate profession of faith, long kept up, in connection with fear and aversion in regard to what contradicts the factitious creed is in many cases eventually productiv of belief, and in this way the will does really mold the understanding. Religious faith is a standing crusade against reason.—N. Ramsay Waters.

SCIENCE worships truth alone; her steady gaze is fixed upon the real; she never glances aside to follow expediency. Her work is to declare what is; she leaves it to others to say what ought to be. Pure, serene, unwavering science walks through this world of ours; a grand, clear, dry light, illuminating all dark places; revealing, with equal lucidity, beautiful facts and ugly facts. As the rays of the sun fall alike on gorgeous palace and on filthy hovel, on fair and happy faces, and in those ploughed deep with the lines of misery and want, so does the sunlight of science throw clear beams on the glory of nature and illuminate with equal brightness its stains and its dark clots.—Annie Besant's Christianity and Freethought.

IT is Lucifer,
The son of mystery;
And since God suffers him to be,
He, too, is God's minister,
And labors for some good
By us not understood.
—Longfellow's Golden Legend.

THE seeds are planted and the spring is near.
Ages of blight are but a fleeting frost.
Truth circles into truth. Each mote is dear
To God. No drop of ocean e'er is lost,
No leaf forever dry and tempest-tossed.
Life centers deathless underneath decay,
And no true word or deed can ever pass away.
—The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

I NO more expect a reaction in favor of Gotton and old Sareem than a reaction in favor of Thor and Odin. I should think such a reaction almost as much a miracle as that the shadow should go back upon the dial. Revolutions produced by violence are often followed by reactions; the victories of reason once gained are gained for eternity. —Macaulay.

CERTAINLY, if the Bible is such a revelation as men claim, it has egregiously failed to answer the purpose for which it was intended, seeing that men, equally able, earnest, and sincere, differ among themselvs radically and hopelessly.—J. W. Chadwick.

THE constitution of man is such that for a long time after he has discovered the incorrectness of the ideas prevailing around him, he shrinks from openly emancipating himself from their domination; and, constrained by the force of circumstances, he becomes a hypocrit, publicly applauding what his private judgment condemns.—J. W. Draper.

DOTH any man doubt that if there were taken out of men's minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunken things, full of melancholy and indisposition, and unpleasing to themselvs? . . . Truth, which only doth judge itself, teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the love-making or wooing of it; the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it; and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.—Bacon's Essays.

MEN never receive a historical religion upon historical grounds, and only in very rare instances take any pains With the historical argument before becoming believers. Mental habitudes, education, and social circumstances, in the main, determin one's religion. A person first gets his religion and then perhaps looks at the "evidences;" his mind made up and turned away from anything that contradicts them.—Waters's Through Rome On.

NOTHING is so easy as to rail; many an old woman is apt in it.—Homer.

WHEREUNTO is money good?
Who has it not wants hardihood;
Who has it, has much trouble and care,
Who once has had it, has despair.
—Longfellow's Poetic Aphorisms.

Odds and Ends.

BE content with your lot, especially if it's a corner one.

NATURE keeps the ocean tide, and that is why it does not run away like a river.

THE confidential clerk now takes his vacation to giv his employer a chance to look over his books.

NEXT to money i think a man kan git more out ov the world with politeness than enything else.—Josh Billings.

A RHODE ISLAND man called a neighbor a "lantern-jawed cockroach." A suit for slander resulted, and the jury returned as follows: "Not guilty on lantern-jawed, but way off on cockroach, and we find damages in the sum of three cents.

MR. L. W. MASON has remodeled the Japanese musical scale, adding three notes to it. Think of the horrid possibilities of a similar addition to our musical scale, and then let your heart go out in sympathy to these poorly-treated brown men of the outraged orient! It is said that even the youngest pupils in Japan "now sing as correctly as Boston children of the same ages." Come to think of it, we hav no desire to go to Japan.

FOND friendship tried vainly to cheer her,
To stop up the tears that fast fell;
And she clasped her daughter still nearer,
And in agony uttered farewell!

The groom with his bride has departed,
To journey far off in strange lands,
And the mother cries out, broken-hearted:
"Well! I'm glad that girl's off of my hands."

SHE said he had a flattering tongue,
As to his arms she fondly clongue,
And love's sweet roundelay he songue.

You cannot, cannot love me luess;
Giv me the little hand I pruess!

'Tis thine, she said, with glance oblique,
While blushing roses dyed her chique—
The twain will be made one next wique.

MAUD'S ANSWER.

Come out of the garden, Tom,
'Fore a big brickbat is thrown;
Come out of the garden, Tom,
I'm here on the fence, alone;
And cast-off shoes are wafted abroad,
And the musk of hoses blown.

For a frantic boarder's astir
(And there's blood in his frenzied eye);
Beginning to loosen that brindle cur,
O Tom! I shall faint, I shall die;
Shall faint in my fear of that dreadful cur,
Shall faint in my fear, or fly.

From the next-door window a lodger has poked
The barrel of a blunderbuss;
Come, Tommy, let's go! Don't think I've joked;
The deacon up-stairs has cussed;
The cook, in her attic, has grumbled, has croaked;
O Tom! lets fly, let's dust!

There has fallen a bootjack, dear,
And a cuspador here by the gate;
He is coming! He'll soon be here—
The man with the hairless pate.
Let us leave! Let us go! it is queer
How thus you can trifle with fate.

He is coming, O Tom, my sweet,
With a noiseless, crafty tread;
Let us leave! Oh, let us retreat,
Till the monster goes back to bed.
Let us fly! Oh, let us retreat!
Let us wait on the roof of the shed.

"THIS is the porterhouse, is it?" asked the sad passenger sitting at the corner table in the restaurant.

"Yes, sir," said the waiter, with the weary air of a man who was tired of having to tell the same lie a thousand times a day, "porterhouse steak, sir, same as you ordered, sir."

"Do you cut porterhouse steak from between the horns this year?" asked the sad passenger, with the intonation of a man who wanted to know.

"I do," said the waiter.

"It seemed to be a trifle tenderer last year," the sad passenger went on, with the air of a tired man indulging in pleasant reminisences of the past, "but I remember now; it was cut a trifle lower down then. Last year you cut your porterhouse steaks from the curl in the forehead, and the sirloins from the shin. But I think this comes from between the horns. I used to liv in a boarding-house where they cut the porterhouse between the horns, and this one reminds me of them. Animal dead this steak came from?"

"Dead," echoed the astonished waiter; "course, sir. He was butchered sir."

"Butchered to make a Roman holiday," sighed the sad passenger. "He would be more likely to make a Roman swear. Well, it was time it was killed. He hadn't many more years to liv on this earth. Ah, here is the brass tip from one of his horns. Dropped into the steak no doubt while you were slicing it off. What do you do with these steaks when the guests are through with them?"

The waiter looked puzzled. "Why, sir," he said, "they ain't nothing left of 'em, sir."

"Possible?" said the sad passenger; "what becomes of them?" The waiter looked nervous.

"What?" he said; "the customers eat them up." The sad passenger looked up with an air of interest.

"Incredible," he exclaimed; "cannot accept your word without proof. They may hide them under their chairs or secrete them in their napkins, or they may carry them away in their pockets to throw at burglars, but I cannot believe they eat them. Here, let me see one of them eat this and I will believe you. Trust me, good waiter, I—"

But the waiter pointed to a placard inscribed: "Positivly no trust," and went to the cashier's desk to tell the boss to look out for that man at the corner table, as he didn't seem to be satisfied with his steak and had asked for trust.—Burlington Hawkeye.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 40. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, October 1, 1881. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

DR. MAUDSLEY, the eminent English neurologist, says that "the true site, seat, or organ of the mind is the whole body."

THE autograph of Martin Luther was recently sold for $150; that of Melancthon for $56, and that of Voltaire for $2,250.

MR. CHARLES HENRY FOSTER, the well-known Spiritualist medium, has been removed to the insane asylum at Danvers, Mass. Mr. Foster has been ill from typhoid fever, and upon his recovery was bereft of his reason.

AN English journal thinks there is something peculiarly absurd in the announcement of harvest "thanksgiving" services, seeing that instead of being abundant and of good quality, the yield seems likely to be scanty and poor.

A PASSAGE from the prayer of a Cincinnati clergyman, the rest being devoted to a petition for the recovery of the President: "Forever accursed be the hand that committed this foul deed. May endless tortures rack him here and hereafter."

A JOINT convention of Spiritualists and spirits is called at Lynn, Mass., and the former believe that the latter will then make known the place where Thomas Veal, the pirate, hid his treasure. The intention is to devote the money to the propagation of Spiritualism.

BOB INGERSOLL wouldn't hav been flung out of the Capitol building if he had been elected to Congress, as Bradlaugh was out of the House of Commons. None of our members are obliged to believe in God. If they happen to it is simply a streak of luck.—Free Press.

LAST Sunday Henry Ward Beecher said: "I hav a right to speak of Guiteau. He once was of us, or, rather, he was among us, but not of us. He sat in our classes; he united with the throng in our sanctuary. I cannot dismiss him without a sense of sorrow and mourning."

THE International Congress will be held in the Hall of Science, London, England, on Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, September 25th, 26th, and 27th. Most of the leading Freethinkers of England will attend. Mr. Bradlaugh will deliver an address on the Sunday evening. There is likely to be a good muster of Freethinkers from all parts of Europe and America.

THE Salvation Army appears to be in a bad way in England. While a detachment were recently parading the streets in Reading, singing hymns, they were attacked by a mob of two thousand persons, who smashed a number of windows in the Salvation barracks. We will wager that every one in the mob was a Christian, as that is their way of showing disapproval.

THE pastor of St. Mary's Roman Catholic church, Pittsburgh, announces that he will refuse absolution to any parent or guardian who sends children to the public instead of the parochial schools. A member declares that in case of the priest's refusal to spiritually minister to his family in the manner prescribed by the usages of the church, recourse will be had to civil law.

A CHINESE witness in a Philadelphia court, after taking an oath with a particularly loud kiss of the Bible, was asked if he considered himself bound thereby to tell the truth. He complacently answered that the Bible was no more to him than the lawyer's old white hat. The only form of oath that he would respect, he said, was to cut off a chicken's head while repeating certain words in Chinese. A chicken and knife were provided by the opposing counsel, but the judge said that, though inclined to permit the ceremony, he would adjourn the trial for a week to consider the question.

KALLOCH, who has long been troublesome to the Baptists of the Pacific coast, now withdraws from fellowship with them and takes his church and his son Isaac, Jr. An independent church is thus formed. The Baptists make no concealment of their joy at getting rid of the Kallochs and their followers, whom they consider a pestilent set. Kalloch has announced that he will retire from politics, but also announces himself as a candidate for Congress.

THE following requisition, sent by Gov. Jonathan Jennings of Indiana to John C. Calhoun, Secretary of State, has been found among some old records:

Dear, good John C.,
I send to thee
For three great guns and trimmings,
Pray send them to hand,
Or you'll be damned,
By order of Jonathan Jennings,
Governor of Indiana.

A REVEREND gentleman, who resides in the county just across the Ohio river, recently consulted a physician in regard to some malady which troubled him, and was told to take a "sun-bath." He resorted to the woods, and was luxuriating in the warm beams of old Sol, when he was surprised by a party of hunters, and skedaddled out of pure modesty. Thinking him some demented individual, he was run down, captured, and taken before a justice, where the actions of the gentleman of theological proclivities were satisfactorily explained. He will probably migrate to some lone Pacific islet where he can enjoy sun-baths without molestation.

IN LaSalle county, in one of the small towns, they held a prayer-meeting to pray for the President's recovery. An old lady who was present put the following petition to the throne of grace. It is, so far as heard from, the best thing on this subject that has been reported: "O Lord, come down; come forthwith and doctor the President. Lord, don't delay, or you will be too late. O Lord, let thy mercy hover around the hole in the President's back, and cause it to come to a head. Let thy love enter the hole and tussle and wrestle with the pus, Lord. Yes, Lord, wrestle with the pus and bring it forth, all for thy glory. And, Lord, if thy wrath can get around the ball, roll her out, for the redeemer's sake, Amen."

MRS. COOPER, cousin of Col. Robert Ingersoll, and member of a San Francisco Presbyterian church, announced her disbelief of the story of Jonah and the whale. She was adjudged a heretic by the session of the church and expelled. She retaliated by accusing the pastor, the Rev. Mr. Roberts, of bad conduct of various kinds, and particularly of preaching a sermon which was in effect an advertisment of his own business as a life insurance agent. There has been an acrimonious controversy and a trial before the Presbytery, in which Mr. Roberts incidentally accused a reverend brother of "bombast, malignity, and ingratitude," and Mrs. Cooper remarked that she would rather hav her cousin Ingersoll's society in hell than her pastor's in heaven. Mrs. Cooper was pronounced a heretic by a vote of nine to eight.

E. FRANKLAND, of the Royal College of Chemistry, writes thus of the water of a holy well: "In view of the present outbreak of cholera in the East, the following communication, accompanying a sample of the water of a sacred well, from her Majesty's consul at Jeddah, is both interesting and instructiv: 'The well is in Mecca, the water is regarded as holy, and large quantities are annually sent as gifts to all Mussulman countries. Most of the Mohammedan princes, especially those of India, hav "keepers of the well," whose duty it is to send them annually water from the well.' I hav analyzed this water, and find it to be of the the most abominable character. In fact, it is sewage more than seven times as concentrated as London sewage, and it contains no less than 579 grains of solid matters per gallon. Knowing the composition of this water, and the mode of propagation of Asiatic cholera by excrementitious matters, it is not to be wondered at that outbreaks of this disease should often occur among pilgrims to Mecca, while it would scarcely be possible to provide a more effectiv means for the distribution of cholera poison throughout Mohammedan countries."

THE NAKED TRUTH.

Falsehood and truth, the story goes,
Upon the beach one summer day,
Unrobed and, laying down their clothes,
Bathed in the waters of the bay.

Now plump and roseate was Truth,
With rounded arm and well-turned limb,
A countenance aglow with youth
That God above had given him.

But Falsehood's legs are long and slim,
His bony face wrinkled and old,
His claw-like fingers, poor and thin,
Clutched like a miser grasping gold.

And jealous feelings filled his breast
While bathing on the briny bay;
So, hidden by a wave's white crest,
He watched his chance to slip away.

All unperceived he scrambled out,
And wrapped Truth's robes about his form;
The ample vestments flapped about
Like fluttering sails amid a storm.

But ever since he lifts his head,
And swaggers like a lusty youth;
While far behind, with faltering tread,
Abashed, ashamed, comes naked Truth.

A VERY interesting correspondence has been going on in the columns of the Yeoman, a New Zealand journal, upon the Bible and its teachings. A writer, signing himself "Defense," boldly stated that the New Testament nowhere teaches that the "sinner" will be punished forever in hell. To this a correspondent, "Vindicator," who appears to be a most devout orthodox Christian, replies: "The Bible expressly states that for those who do not believe in Jesus Christ there is no salvation. You must believe in Jesus Christ or be cast into hell, 'where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched,' and where every immortal sinner shall be 'salted with fire.' Will 'Defensé' read Matt. xxv, 41–46? I quote verse 41: 'Then shall he say also unto those on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' Let 'Defense' consider for a moment the utter absurdity of the doctrin he supports. If there is no such thing as eternal punishment in hell, what could possibly hav induced the son of God, co-equal and co-eternal with the father, to come down on earth and voluntarily suffer starvation, insult, a cruel death, and even a descent into hell-fire?"

THE Methodist ministers of Philadelphia are in a state of misery on account of the doings of the wicked reporters of the secular press. These carnal and unregenerate persons hav been guilty of the offense of reporting the ministerial meetings in a way which displeased the brethren. Sometimes these brethren said queer and funny things which were not intended for publication. They were much annoyed to notice that the wicked reporters took particular pleasure in noting these things, while omitting to record the more serious and important things which fell from the lips of the reverend speakers. The preachers appointed a committee to wait on the Philadelphia editors and ask for more faithful reports. Some of the committee thought that what was printed was too greatly condensed. They expressed a preference for complete verbatim reports, in order to do full justice to the speakers and their speeches. At this the editors loudly smiled. But the preachers say that if the reports cannot be given in full the reporters shall not be admitted. It will be recollected that the "Preachers' Meeting" of this city some time ago reduced itself from being one of the most attractiv gatherings in town to the level of a meeting so lifeless that nobody cared to spend time upon it. This was by its action in excluding reporters.

News of the Week.

ON September 26th the thermometer registered 90 degrees in the shade in New York city.

THREE men were killed and thirty wounded by a railroad disaster in Greene county, Iowa, on Sunday last.

THE Rev. Dr. John McCaffrey, one of the most noted clergymen in the Catholic church, died in Maryland last Monday.

THE City Hall and a number of manufactories were burned in Ottawa, Illinois, last week. Loss, between $150,000 and $200,000.

A YOUNG man was instantly killed at Cleveland by a fall from a high stone wall while viewing the funeral procession of the late President.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE, Philadelphia, was burned on the night of the 25th ult. The fire originated from the explosion of chemicals in the laboratory. Loss, $300,000.

THE Rev. Daniel Corey, for two years pastor of a Baptist church at Stillwater, N. Y., has resigned his charge. The woman is a young lady who acted as housekeeper for him.

KALAKAUA, king of the Sandwich Islands, has just spent a week in New York and vicinity. He dresses like a civilized man, but speaks the barbarous English of a cockney.

ASPERSIONS of cowardice hav led Hanlan, champion oarsman of the world, to offer to row anybody a farewell match for the final championship for from $1,000 to $5,000 a side. Wallace Ross has responded.

PRESIDENT CHESTER A. ARTHUR took the oath of office at twelve minutes past two on the morning of Sept. 20th. In his proclamation he stated that he should endeavor to perpetuate the form of administration inaugurated by his predecessor.

QUINCY, Ill., was struck, September 25th, by one of the most terribly destructiv tornadoes that ever visited that section of the country. Four men were killed, and a vast amount of property was destroyed. The loss to the farming community is estimated at $150,000.

A FRUIT vender, named Randazzo, arrested in New Orleans, and claimed by the Italian government to be Esposito, a Sicilian brigand, has been extradited to Italy. In this country there is great doubt about the justice of the extradition, and also the identity of Randazzo with Esposito, the bandit. Many persons who hav studied the case claim that it may lead to diplomatic complications with Italy.

THE funeral of the late President took place at Cleveland, Ohio, on Monday, the 26th ult., in the presence of over 300,000 people. The day was generally observed as one of mourning throughout the country, most of the business places closing. Nearly every building, public and private, in and around the city has been draped in mourning ever since the day of the President's death. Guiteau, the assassin, has been hung in effigy many times in this vicinity. Considerable contradiction of opinion prevails as to where the trial of Guiteau shall be held, whether in the District of Columbia, where the murder was committed, and where he is to be indicted next week, or in New Jersey, where the death took place. The fact that the autopsy shows that the physicians' diagnosis of the President's wound was altogether erroneous—that the ball was found encrysted near the spinal column instead of being lodged in the anterior wall of the abdomen, and that the surgeons had been probing and reporting upon a burrow formed by the pus instead of the real wound—will raise the question at the trial whether the President died from the wound proper or from malpractice. The surgeons, while admitting their mistaken diagnosis, aver, however, that the wound was necessarily mortal. A fund of more than $300,000 has been raised by subscription for the Garfield family.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Midnight had long past; morning approaching. Into my eyes came no sleep. I did not even undress myself, but ran up and down my room in violent emotion. What a night! What had I learned! I was not yet able to believe such a horrible crime, against which all nature rebels. An innocent, virtuous woman, who had never offended the husband, plunged into imprisonment and life-long disgrace! Misusing the friend to defend the hellish deed and to torment innocence upon the torture, more bitter than death can be.

I felt well, when I thought Bertollon, with all this, only wanted to put my friendship to the test, for, could he possibly hav acted so frightfully, how might he dare, his life long, to hav a glass of wine cross his lips, since every drop of it threatened to reveal his secret? How could he disclose himself to a wicked one? How much less uncover to an honest man his whole contemptuous sinfulness?

But in vain I wished to be deceived. His expressions about me and his unfortunate wife, and how he then would gladly hav transferred the wife to me—— Alas! everything was only too certain! Now it dawned before me in the darkness of his former plans. I recollected the many of his dropped expressions, and that he it was who led me to Madame Bertollon, and never wanted to distrust the virtue of us both. And when he spoke to me about the violence of her temper he prepared then his designs to load a crime upon her. Perhaps he regretted that I became no adulterer!

The morning had dawned, and I stood yet without resolution. Innocence must be rescued; but her rescue was the destruction of my benefactor, of my first, my only friend; only an over-abundance of love for me and an intoxication of wine had elicited the terrible confession; should I go and betray him? He was the creator of my fortune; should the hand that had received from him innumerable alms ungratefully fling him into the vast abyss? Alas! and him whom I still loved, the only one I should lose!

"Unfortunate linking of events!" sighed I. "Why must I become the instrument to put innocence in chains or to kill my benefactor?"

But my conscience cried, Be just before thou wilt be kind! Whatever may be the consequences of our acts, which we exercise dutifully, and must we destroy ourselvs, nothing should keep back, if virtue is at stake. You may plunge back into your poverty and go lonely and friendless through the world, only preserve thy independence and carry within thee the silent consciousness, Thou didst as thou shouldst, as a just man. There is a God, be pure, as he is!

I wrote to the police officer of the ward to betake himself at once, on account of very important affairs, to me. He came. I went into Bertollon's room, and the officer remained before the door outside.

Bertollon still slept. I trembled. Love and pity overwhelmed me. "Bertollon!" I sighed, and kissed him.

He awoke. I permitted him, while talking about unimportant matters, to collect himself.

"Tell me," said I, finally, "is thy wife really guiltless? Hast thou really thyself poisoned the essence?"

He looked at me with a staring, penetrating look, and answered, "Be silent!"

"But, Bertollon, this answer is a confirmation of thy last night's testimony. I conjure thee, quiet me. Hast thou done it all? or wouldst thou me only ——."

Bertollon raised himself up and said, "Colas, I trust thou art prudent!"

"But speak! Bertollon, to-day the court will pronounce the sentence upon thy wife. Do not let innocence perish."

"Art thou mad, Colas? Shouldst thou hav the desire to become a traitor to thy friend?"

While he stammered this, I saw him in violent emotion. He had turned very pale, and his lips became livid, and his eyes stared horribly before him. All taught me only too surely that he in the night during his intoxication had acknowledged things before which he now himself was frightened, as he found them no more secure with me.

I laid my hand on his shoulder and whispered into his ear, "Bertollon, dress thyself, take gold enough with thee, and flee! I take care of all the rest!"

With a look that would pronounce my death he said, "Why?"

"Flee, I say. It is yet time."

"Why?" replied he. "Hast thou in mind—or, perhaps, already"——

"For the sake of all that is dear and sacred to thee, flee, I say."

While I whispered this to him, he sprang hastily up, ran undressed about the room, as if he were searching. I thought he had in the surprise forgotten that his clothes were lying at his bedside. While I stooped to reach them to him a pistol shot resounded and the blood streamed down over my breast.

The door opened and the police officer stepped in scared. Bertollon, still holding in one hand the discharged pistol, in the other a second one, looked stupefied at the unexpected appearance.

"Accursed dog!" cried he to me, with the distorted features of despair, and enraged flung the unloaded pistol against my head. A new shot was fired. Bertollon had shot himself. He staggered toward me. I caught him in my arms. His head was shattered in pieces.

My senses left me. I sank to the floor and awoke again under the busy hands of the physicians and the servants in my room. My wound, under the left shoulder, had been examined, dressed, and found perfectly harmless.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Everybody was in the greatest consternation. Several of Bertollon's friends were standing before me. Everyone pressed me with questions.

I freed myself from them, and as soon as I had recovered I put fresh clothes on and ordered a sedan-chair, that I might be carried to the court-house.

Bertollon's suicide in the mean time had become known throughout the city. An immense crowd of people surrounded the house. As soon as it became known that I would go to the court-house the curious crowd followed me.

Already in secret sessson of court the sentence had been passed upon Madame Bertollon. In the moment that she was led into the court-room in order to hear her sentence pronounced before the public, I also entered.

I begged to be heard, as I had important disclosures to make. The permission to speak was given me. A stillness took possession of the court-room, as if life had fled from every breast.

"You judges," said I, "once I stood here, an accuser of innocence. I come to save it, and to prepare for it its due triumph. I was deceived by the appearance of circumstances; deceived, misused by my friend, and participator in a cruelty without knowing it. The unfortunate one whose sentence you are about to pronounce is guilty of no crime!"

I now related minutely the history of the past night; related the suicide of Bertollon and his attempt to rob me of my life. Beside me stood the testifying police officer, and lank Jack, who remembered to hav seen Mr. Bertollon come out of his room with a burning candle, the evening before the poisoning scene.

Such a solution of this lawsuit, in which I in the beginning had gained such a grand victory over my opponent, Mr. Menard, and which was to establish my reputation throughout the whole country, nobody had expected. During my speech astonishment and horror were visible in every face. But when I was silent there arose a murmur, and this murmur grew into a loud huzza. The people cried my name with enthusiastic joy, and the eyes of the bystanders were wet with tears.

It was no longer possible to preserve order in the court-room. Madam Bertollon had swooned under the congratulations of those surrounding her. The vice-governor of the province, a relativ of Marshal de Montreval, whom curiosity or accident had brought into the court-room, left his elevated seat and embraced me publicly. Mr. Menard followed his example, under the applause of the enthusiastic people.

I desired to be conducted to Madam Bertollon. My limbs refused to support me. I sank down strengthless, and pressed my tearful eyes upon her hand.

"Can you forgiv me?" stammered I.

With a look full of unspeakable love, with a heavenly smile, she looked down upon me.

"Alamontada," she sighed lightly, and tears hindered her further words.

The session of the court had to be adjourned. The judges embraced me. In vain I wished to come back to Madam Bertollon. The tumult was too great. I was led through the dense crowd of people, which overloaded me with tokens of honor, down the steps of the palace.

About to enter the sedan-chair, I was stopped by a young, well-dressed man.

"You cannot," said he, "you cannot possibly, with agreeable feelings, return to a house, sir, which still contains the corpse of a suicide, and which must everywhere remind you of the terrible events. Grant to me the honor, I beg you, sir, at least for the present, to entertain you at my house."

This invitation, made with such true cordiality, came, nevertheless, unexpectedly to me. Tears still sparkled in the eyes of the young man. He begged so entreatingly that I could not decline. He pressed my hand with warm gratitude, gave an order to the sedan carriers, and disappeared.

Always followed by the cheering crowd of people through the streets of the town, I arrived finally, but very slowly, before the house of my unknown friend. I only noticed that it was in the neighborhood of Bertollon's house and in the street where Clementine lived, which, to me, as confused and stupefied as I was, could be no disagreeable discovery.

At the stairs, in the interior of the house, the sedan-chair was opened. The friendly stranger was already awaiting me. I found myself in a large, magnificent building. Two man-servants led me up the marble stairs.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER III.

CONCERNING THE DIVINE ORIGIN OF THE JEWISH BOOKS.

Could we ever imagin that God chose a crowd of Arab robbers for his cherished people, and then set them against all other nations? By the way, how is it that God permitted his people to be so often vanquished and enslaved? In revealing to his brigands the laws, why did he forget to restrain them by a belief in the immortality of the soul and in punishment after death?*

Why did he forget to teach them those beliefs which all the great neighboring nations, the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Syrians, and Phœnicians had believed in ever since such beliefs were useful to man?

Is it possible that God prescribed the precise manner in which the Jews, while living in the desert, should go to stool,† and at the same time concealed from them the doctrin of immortality? Herodotus said that the famous temple at Tyre was built two thousand three hundred years before his time. It is said that Moses led his people in the desert sixteen hundred years before our era. Herodotus wrote five hundred years before the beginning of our era, therefore the temple of the Phœnicians existed twelve hundred years before Moses, and the Phœnician religion began its existence at a still earlier time. The Phœnician, Chaldean, and Egyptian religions teach the doctrin of the immortality of the soul. The horde of Jews never held that doctrin as the foundation of their creeds. They were a coarse people, it is said, to whom God adapted himself. God adapt himself! and to whom? To those robbers, the Jews? Upon that supposition God would hav proved himself to be more brutal than the Jews themselvs. Are not such ideas blasphemous?

CHAPTER IV.

WHO IS THE AUTHOR OF THE PENTATEUCH?

I am asked who is the author of the Pentateuch. I prefer that I should be asked who wrote "The Four Sons of Aymon," "Robert the Devil," or the "History of the Enchanter Merlin."

Newton, who disgraced himself by seriously examining into that question, pretended that Samuel wrote those reveries called the Pentateuch, apparently in order to render kings odious to the Jews. That detestable priest, Samuel, wished to govern. For my part, I think that the Jews did not know how to read and write except during their captivity among the Chaldeans, since their letters were at first like the letters of the Chaldeans, and then like the letters of the Syrians. We hav never heard of a purely Hebraic alphabet.

I conjecture that Esdras forged all those stories of Tonneau‡ upon his return from captivity. He wrote in Chaldaic characters, and in the idiom of that country, just as the peasants of the north part of Ireland to-day write in English characters.

The Syrians who inhabit Samaria wrote this same

*This if one of the strongest arguments against the Jewish law, and Lord Bolingbroke has not pressed it sufficiently. The Indian legislators, the Egyptians, Babylonians, Greeks, and Romans teach that the soul is immortal. We can prove this by twenty passages in Homer. Moses the pretender has not mentioned this fact! He has not said a word about it either in the Decalogue or in the Pentateuch! Is it possible that the commentators or the ignorant, or even those more knavish than ignorant, hav twisted certain passages of Job (who was no Jew) in order to make men, more ignorant than they, believe that Job had spoken of a future life because he said: "I shall rise from my dung-hill yet, for my protector is living. I shall recover my first skin. I shall get my flesh; beware, then, of mocking and persecuting me?"

What report shall I make, I pray you, of a sick person who suffers and hopes to be cured by the immortality of his soul in hell or paradise? If Warburton had undertaken to demonstrate that the Jewish law did not teach of another life, he would hav rendered us a great service. But by a madness all the more incomprehensible he has endeavored to make us believe that the coarseness of the Pentateuch is a proof of its divine quality, and he has maintained that chimera with extreme impatience [1771].

†Dean Swift says according to the Pentateuch it was more necessary for God to look after the back sides of the Jews than to look after their souls. After reading chapter xxiii of Deuteronomy we judge that the Dean had good reason for his statement [1776].

‡A romance of Dean Swift.

Pentateuch in Phœnician characters, which hav always been in vogue in their nation. We still hav that Pentateuch.

I believe that Jeremiah contributed much to the composition of this romance. Jeremiah was strongly attached, as we know, to the kings of Babylon. His rhapsodies prove that he was paid by the Babylonians and that he deserted his country. He always favored the king of Babylon. The Egyptians were at that time the enemies of the Babylonians. It is to pay court to the great king, master of Hershalem Kedusha, called by us Jerusalem,* that Jeremiah, and after him Esdras inspired the Jews with so much horror of the Egyptians. He took good care to say nothing against the people of the Euphrates. These were the slaves who managed their masters. They truly said that the Jewish tribe had very nearly always been in servitude, but they respected those whom they then served.

That some Jews hav written about the actions and deeds of their petty kings is of no more importance than the history of the chevaliers of the Round Table, or the dozen Peers of Charlemagne, and I regard as all the more futil than all those researches to endeavor to find out the name of the author of a ridiculous book.

Who wrote the first history of Jupiter, Neptune, or Pluto? I do not know, and what is more, I do not care to know.

There is a very ancient life of Moses written in Hebrew, but that has not been embodied in the Jewish canons. We are as ignorant of the author of it as of the authors of the other Jewish books. It is written in the style of "The Thousand and One Nights," which is entirely of Asiatic origin. The following are samples:

In the year 130, after the transmigration of the Jews from Egypt, sixty years after the death of Joseph, one of the Pharaohs during his sleep dreamed † he saw an old man holding a balance in his hands. In one of the scales were all of the Egyptians with their children and their wives, and in the other was a suckling infant who weighed more than all Egypt. The king forthwith called all the magicians and told them of his dream, and they were struck with astonishment and fear. One of the king's councilors predicted that a child of Hebrew parentage would be the ruin of Egypt. He advised the king to kill all the small boys of the Jewish people.

The adventure of Moses saved while floating in the water is very nearly the same as that related in Exodus. Moses was then called Schabar, and his mother Jechotiel. At the age of three Moses, in playing with Pharaoh, seized his crown and placed it on himself. The king wished to condemn him to death, but the angel Gabriel descended from heaven and persuaded the king not to do so. "He is only a child and meant no harm," said the angel. "In order to prove how simple he is," said the angel, "show him a carbuncle and a red coal, and you will see that he will choose the red coal." The king tried the experiment. The infant Moses did not fail to choose the carbuncle, but the angel juggled the red-hot coal in its place. Moses burnt his hand to the bone. The king pardoned him, believing that the child was a fool. So Moses, having been saved once by water, is at another time saved by fire.

All the rest of the history is in the same style. It is difficult to decide which is the most admirable, this fable of Moses, or the fable in the Pentateuch. I offer this question to those who hav more time to spare than I hav. But I must confess that I admire above all those pedants, Grotius, Abaddie, the Abbé Houteville, for a long time manager of the farmer generals at Paris, and finally secretary of the famous Cardinal Dubois, who, I have heard it said, defied all the cardinals to be more Atheistic than he. All those people puzzle their heads in order to force themselvs to believe (that which they do not believe) that the Pentateuch was written by Moses.

Ah! my friends what will you prove in that case? That Moses was a fool. I am sure I would shut up in Bedlam a man who to-day should write in such an extravagant manner.

* Hershalem was the name of Jerusalem, and Kedusha was its secret name. All towns had a secret name which was carefully concealed from enemies for fear their enemies might by enchantment render themselvs master of their towns. Taking all in consideration, the Jews were no more superstitious than their neighbors They were only more cruel, more usurious, and more ignorant [1771].

†In the xxxiv chapter of Ecclesiasticus, one of the apocrypha, the following passage occurs: "The hopes of a man void of understanding are vain and false, and dreams lift up fools. Whoso regardeth dreams is like him that catcheth a shadow, and followeth after the wind."

THE LIBERAL REVISION.—Liberalism, instead of putting people in hell and burning them, puts the orthodox god in the crucible of science and acquired fact, and utterley destroys the monster.

TAKING HELL OUT OF THE BIBLE.—The Anglican revisers did a good thing in taking hell out of the Bible. Now the next step is for orthodox and Liberals alike to take hell out of the people. This is the pre-eminent need of the age.—Reuben Dailey.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO 52.

573. I don't believe there is very much accuracy, reliability, or importance connected with the prophecies attributed to Jeremiah. In chronological order he is placed second among the prophets, while in reality he should stand twelfth. He lived more than a hundred years after Isaiah, his career beginning 626 B. C. and ending 584 B. C. The best critics say that he is not the author of all that is attributed to him. Chapters l, li, and lii are denied to be his, and the greatest confusion and irregularity mark large portions of the book. It seems to be a medley of historical scraps, lamentations, and a kind of prediction. Had it been given out that it was written by a somewhat convalescent inmate of an insane asylum, it could have been readily accepted. The incorrectness of his predictions may be estimated by his prophesying that the captivity would continue for seventy years, when it was but fifty. Another instance was his assuring King Zedekiah that he should not die by the sword, but in peace, and that odors should be burnt at his death, when the finale proved that he did not die in peace and that odors were not burnt at his death. In chapter lii we learn that the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, then put out the eyes of Zedekiah, bound him in chains; took him captive to Babylon, and kept him in prison till his death. Still again Jeremiah showed himself an untruthful prophet when he predicted the restoration of the ten lost tribes of Israel. Almost any guesser of tolerable ability could make as good hits as he did. He was a gloomy, unhappy man, as is abundantly shown in his main book, and particularly in his Lamentations. He was, however, shrewd enough to make friends with Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who showed him marked favors. Indeed, the prophet has been accused of being untrue to his own people and of showing undue allegiance to the Babylonish king. In modern parlance, he evidently "knew which side of his bread was buttered." As a prophet, however, he does not deserve to rank very high.

574. I do not think much more of Ezekiel as a prophet than of the two preceding ones. In the Bible order he stands third, while in correct chronological order his place would be thirteenth, and this one little fact shows the utter unreliability of the whole arrangement. Ezekiel was a priest of Jerusalem, and was carried to Babylon with ten thousand others eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem. His prophetic career continued for some twenty-two years. Ewald considers him a writer rather than a prophet. He was noted for startling visions and sensational descriptions, somewhat in the style of Daniel, with perhaps more coarseness and crudeness. Kuenen considered him a sort of Hebrew John Calvin—severe and narrow. Chadwick adds, "His book, like Isaiah's and Jeremiah's, was a record of the prophecies, written out at the end of his life;" and he concludes that the prophet's memory was particularly at fault. "At any rate," he says, "in judging of the prophecies we ought never to forget that almost without exception they were written out long after they were uttered, and that afterward from time to time they were ed ited, and thus re-edited again and again, and made to agree with subsequent events." He prophesied the rebuilding of the temple, but when it was built his plans were entirely disregarded as impracticable, which, perhaps, furnished a good indication of the value attached to his utterances. His ground plan seems to have been very extensive, and would have required nearly the space of the entire city. This portion of his prophecies is seldom dwelt upon by his admirers. His prophecies about the city of Tyre were never fulfilled. He said the site of the city should be scraped as a rock and become a place for the drying of nets. But the city existed many hundreds of years after this prediction was made, and even down to the present time considerable of a town exists there. When, however, he or his editors had time to arrange and modify his prognostications with the fulfillments, it was not extremely difficult to make them tally somewhat. He has often been criticised as a coarse writer, and by reading his fourth, sixteenth, and twenty-third chapters this censure would seem to be well sustained. It is greatly to be doubted that he possessed the power to read the events of the future any more correctly than thousands of his fellow-beings; and it is to be hoped that his writings may have been of some use to the world at the time they were written, for they seem to be of very little use in modern times.

575. There is little reliability to be placed upon the book of Daniel. It stands the fourth among the prophets, when it should be the last, for all the others were written before it. In the marginal notes it is claimed to have been written 537 B. C., but, as a matter of fact, was not written till 250 B. C., while some reduce the time to 165 B. C. Chadwick, after giving the views of Kuenen, Ewald, and De Wette, says: "There is not a respectable critic who disputes that it was written in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, from 170 to 165 B. C. The writer's object was to strengthen the faithful among the Jewish people under the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes and to encourage them with the hope of a speedy deliverance. Even as an acknowledged fiction, it was well adapted to its purpose. How much better as a veritable prophecy of the time of the captivity? This it professed to be. Speaking squarely, it was a pious fraud." This is undoubtedly a correct view of the case, and thus we are led to infer that the prophecies of Daniel were not made by Daniel at all, nor till some four hundred years after Daniel had been laid in his grave. This is a striking exemplification of the imposition that has been played upon the world in the matter of the Jewish prophecies. The book of Daniel was the last to be admitted into the Jewish canon, and it got in by the greatest difficulty. It was never placed among the prophets by the Jews, and, as Chadwick says, "It was left for the Christians to perpetrate this piece of literary folly." From all this we are led to the conviction that all the remarkable visions seen by Daniel in Babylon are the merest fiction. The story of the three young men being thrown into the fiery furnace, of Daniel's being thrown into the lions' den, are of the same class, for none of these accounts were written by Daniel. The whole thing is a fabrication—is not worth the paper on which it was written. How futile and absurd, then, the days, weeks, months, and years that have been spent by modern prophecy-mongers in trying to decipher the wild visions of the false Daniel with the view of telling when the world is coming to an end! And the numerous failures that have taken place in these times so set show how worse than worthless the whole thing really is.

576. Hosea is the first of what are called the miner prophets. He stands fifth among the prophets, but correctly would be the second. He tells that the Lord commanded him, "Go take a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms." So he went and took Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim, which conceived and bare him a son. And the Lord said unto him, "Call his name Jezreel." All this may have been of immense importance to mankind in that age of the world, but I do not believe that it is of the slightest consequence now whether Hosea took a wife of whoredoms or not, or whether she bore him a son or not. Those who believe that the creator and governor of the universe has occupied himself with and given commands regarding things of this kind are quite at liberty to do so, but I decidedly believe nothing of the kind.

577. Joel is the next in order, but he was only a small prophet; he wrote but three chapters, in which he talks chiefly about the anger of God. There is a dispute of some two hundred years as to the time when it was written, some saying eight hundred, some six hundred B. C. I don't believe I care which figures are settled upon as the correct ones, as but little importance can be attached to Joel anyway.

578. Amos, with nine chapters, follows Joel, but really he is the captain, or the oldest, and should have been placed first. If his own word is taken for what he says, he did not amount to very much as a prophet, for he says he is neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and, for one, I am willing to take him at his own valuation. His nine chapters are merely a wail, a turmoil of indigent grief, that his God should be worshiped with lascivious rites, and that men cared more for empty ceremonies than for justice, mercy, and truth. What he wrote was not of great consequence when it was written, and it holds its own even unto this day.

579. Obadiah is the next prophet; but as he has but one chapter of twenty-one verses, it is hardly necessary to take up his case. He said but little in his one short chapter, and we will say as little of him.

580. Next comes our friend Jonah, who had the remarkable experience with the whale. It is perhaps hardly necessary for me to say that I do not quite believe all that is stated in this short book. It is not known when the book was written, where it was written, by whom it was written, who Jonah was, whether he was a Jew or Gentile, or whether there ever was a Jonah, and I will not undertake to decide. It is very easy for those of much faith to believe that Jonah was swallowed by a great fish and remained safely housed three days in his stomach, at the expiration of which time he was safely vomited on dry land; and had it read that this same Jonah swallowed the whale and all the water round about they could just as easily have believed it. Blessed is faith.

581. Micah is the next prophet; and as the burden of his song is a denunciation of falsehood and false prophets, I will not quarrel with him, but will grant that such a man as Micah might have lived about the year 750 B. C., and might easily have written the seven chapters accredited to him; and if he was only a tolerably smart sort of man he ought to have been able to do so without special help from on high.

582. I fear we cannot give Nahum the credit of being a very great prophet. He wrote, so far as is known, but three chapters of forty-seven verses; and his maledictions were chiefly directed against the Assyrians, by whom he was taken captive while fearing a threatened invasion from the Scythians; but as none of his predictions ever came to pass, he must be regarded as a failure as a prophet.

A YEAR or more ago a man named Cowley, a minister of the Protestant Episcopal church in New York, who had been placed in charge of a charitable institution called the "Shepherd's Fold," was, after a fair trial in a secular court, convicted of the most atrocious cruelty practiced upon the little orphans under his care. His sentence was approved by the community generally, and his name became a hissing and a by-word among all people. The other day his term of imprisonment expired, when, instead of seeking some humble position in which he might earn a living by manual labor, he had the effrontery to knock at the door of the denomination to which he belonged and demand recognition as a clergyman. And to the shame of the brethren, his insolent demand was acceded to, and the sacred mantle of mother church again adorns the shoulders of the ex-convict. Had he exhibited penitence and asked to be received on trial as a layman until his reform should be apparent, no one would object; but to indorse his claim of innocence and receive him at once to full fellowship and communion as a minister of Christ, is monstrous.

The Ark Story.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I understand that you are willing to publish both sides of the question on theology, and therefore take the opportunity to refute some very absurd assertions made by yourself and pagan Bob Ingersoll and other Infidels in regard to Noah's ark, which is misrepresented most grossly, either through wilful misrepresentation or else through not understanding the holy writ, and I challenge refutation of the facts which I now adduce by Ingersoll, Jamieson, yourself, or any other Infidel. And, gentlemen, when you speak in regard to this please giv facts, and not opinions, surmises, or sophistry. That such a wonderful structure once existed admits of no reasonable doubt in the Christian and Jewish world. In regard to the gopher-wood of which it was built, that is easily settled. The name, gopher-wood, is a corruption of cedar-wood. That is assuredly the wood from which the ark was built. You find that Herodotus and Theophrastus relate that a whole fleet was built of it by the kings of Syria and Egypt. There is also proof of it in pieces of the ark which are preserved to this day. The dimensions of the ark were three hundred cubits in length, fifty in width, and thirty in hight, which size, considering the number of things it contained, at first seems too small, hence the argument by Infidels against its existence. Celsus long ago called it "the absurd ark," but this is mere calling names without proof, and the modern Infidels, though they hav often attacked it, hav come no nearer to refuting the sacred truth. This difficulty is easily overcome. The common cubit being a foot and a half proves geometrically [sic] that the ark was large enough to hold all the animals and their food. Cumberland and others compute a cubit to be 21.88 inches. Smellus computes that the ark covered about one-half acre. Cuncus and others calculate about the same. Father Lancy says it was larger by one hundred and ten feet than the church of St. Mary at Paris. Bishop Wilkins says that only seventy-four animals required a place in the ark. Butler computed that all the animals in the ark would not equal five hundred horses or fifty-six pairs of oxen. Father Lancy enlarges it to sixty-four pairs. Thus the fact is clearly demonstrated that one floor would suffice for five hundred horses, allowing a space nine feet square for each horse. As to the food contained in the second floor, it is observed by Beautea from Calumella that thirty pounds of hay is enough for one ox per day, and a solid cubit of hay pressed would last an ox a day. Now a second floor containing 150,000 cubits would be sufficient to contain food for two years. So you see there would be plenty of room for food and water. As to the third story, no one can doubt but that it was large enough to contain the fowls, insects, and Noah and his family; therefore it appears more difficult to assign a sufficient number and bulk of things to fill the ark than to find room enough for the species of animals already known to hav been there. This I attribute to our lists of animals, especially of those of the unknown parts of the world. I will add that the most expert mathematician of the day could not assign the proportions of a vessel better adapted to the purpose than is here done. Therefore I conclude, and I believe you will also, that the question of the capacity of the ark, which has with some been an objection to the holy scriptures, ought to be considered a confirmation of its divine authority, since in those ruder ages it is scarcely possible that men could hav constructed it so perfectly without divine aid. The whole argument you can bring to bear against the account of the flood and the ark can be easily refuted by bringing to notice the fact that it was a local flood and did not require a large ark. You Infidels forget that nothing is impossible with God—a being whose existence Infidels deny without adducing a particle of proof in support of their assertions. Now, Mr. Editor, you say that you are a truth seeker. I am also a seeker for truth, and will accept the truth from the holy Bible, which you can also do, if you will only read it in a more Christian spirit. I would like to hav you publish this article, and I would like to hav you answer it if you can. If I am in the wrong I want to know it, and if I am right I want your readers to know it. I hav some more articles in defense of Christianity which I would like to hav published. I am constrained to admit that you show more fairness in publishing both sides than religious papers ever do. REV. J. SMITH.

Hillsboro, Or.

The Rev. J. Smith has evidently paid more attention to studying commentators than composition. Hereafter, when any Christian feels moved of God to write us he will please hire some one to reconstruct his stuff for him, for we shall not.

This particular divine pins his faith on the deluge story, and says it is an admitted fact in the Christian and Jewish world. Even if that is so, which it is not, it would not make the story true. It was once an admitted fact in the Christian and Jewish world that the earth was flat and the sun went around it, being on top in the day-time and underneath in the night, but being an "admitted fact" did not make it so, and, if we are not mistaken, it is now an admitted fact that the Christian and Jewish world was in error. And it is not impossible they may be in regard to the flood. Ignorance has admitted many things that knowledge has overthrown. The truth of the matter is that the deluge story is only admitted by those who never examined into it, but swallow all the priests tell them, taking the Bible, deluge story, whale story, creation story, Moses-in-the-bulrush story, Joshua-stopping-the-sun story, Samson-and-his-ass's-jaw bone story, Holy-Ghost-conception story, Joseph-and-his-dream story, Jonah-and-his-gourd story, and all the other improbable and impossible yarns, legends, and lies that make up what is called by gowned and spectacled ignorance, "God's Word."

As to the kind of wood the ark was supposed to be made of, it is immaterial. Mr. Smith cannot be certain that the gopher-wood was cedar. It is only supposed to be by those who hav an interest in making Bible lies appear facts. When the reverend gentleman asserts it positivly he says what he does not know. No one knows exactly what gopher-wood is. But when our Christian friend says there are pieces of the ark extant at this time he says what he cannot prove. Where are they? Who has them? And how does Mr. Smith know they are pieces of the ark? What documents has he got to confirm his statements? Who saw the ark demolished and who preserved the pieces? Has he got the affidavit of one man, even a Christian, that he saw the ark? There are enough pieces of the cross in European cathedrals and churches to make over a hundred crosses such as Jesus was said to hav been crucified on, each one sworn to be a veritable piece of the only true cross, but Mr. J. Smith is the only one presumptuous or ignorant enough to pretend that there are pieces of Noah's ark in existence. He will next pretend that he knows where Moses was buried and that he has a piece of his tombstone in his possession.

As to the capacity of the Noah's mud-scow our friend is away off. In the first place a three-story affair, fifty-five feet deep, flat-bottomed, with no center-board, would be a very dangerous craft to go sailing in. To be sure, if all the animals with their food were in, it would be well ballasted, but no ship-builder of the present day would think of building his craft entirely above water. Steamers not more than half the length of Noah's tub draw twenty feet, and at that rate the ark would be forty feet under water. But being flat-bottomed it would not sink quite so deep, so we can call it thirty feet, which would only leave twenty-five feet out of water. Any one who has smelt of a ship's hold can imagin what a stench there would hav been in the ark with all the animals, birds, reptils, and insects aboard.

If Bishop Wilkins said that only seventy-four animals required a place in the ark he must hav been a terrible ignoramus, or else he didn't believe in the Bible story that God created them all. Either God created all the animals that now liv or ever hav lived, or he did not. Our belief is that he did not, but that don't count now. Either he drowned all those, except some specimens, or he did not. If he did create them all and drowned them, then there must hav been preserved a good many more than seventy-four. Even the computation of Butler, another ignoramus, of five hundred horses and fifty-six pairs of oxen, is altogether too small. There are, according to Hugh Miller, 1,650 known species of mammalia, 6,266 of birds, 642 of reptils, and 550,000 of insects. If these were not all in existence before the flood, then they must hav sprung into being without any creativ act, which is directly contrary to the theory of the Christians, and is a first-class argument in favor of evolution. As our reverend friend probably does not want to support Darwinism, he will take the other horn of the dilemma—go back on himself, and say that these animals, birds, reptils, and insects must hav found a place in the ark. But there are other naturalists who say Miller understates the number. Gray says eight thousand birds and over two thousand mammals. Of birds, Noah took seven each of males and females into the ark, which would giv him 112,000 birds, 8,000 beasts, and about a million insects. The beasts alone would hav filled all the floors of the ark and left no place for Noah and his family, for the birds, reptils, and insects, and it would assuredly not hav done to let the rattlesnakes and tarantulas browse around loose.

And there was no room left for food, which was no small item for all these different species. A Bengal tiger in good condition would hardly liv on air, and an African lion in full possession of his faculties would murmur if left without food for several months. Noah had to provide food for himself and family, and all these animals, birds, reptils, and insects, for the Bible says God said, "Take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee." It is seen that Noah not only had to find room for the food, but had to gather it also—a rather hard task for an old man six hundred years old and his three boys. Nothing is said about the fishes, but as every living thing outside the ark perished, Noah must hav taken them in or else they must hav come into being since—a theory too evolutionary to be entertained for a moment by a good Christian. Even if packed in like sardines, the ark would accommodate but a fractional part of the beasts alone, leaving out in the cold all the birds, reptils, insects, and fishes, and there would not hav been room for an ounce of food. An animal with a moderate appetite would hav eaten four or five times his own weight, and if our Oregonian pastor will take his slate and pencil and go over to his district school teacher, he can get him to figure out how many times over the size of Noah's tub the bulk of live stock and food was. The result will astonish him.

But Mr. Smith hardly seems to believe the story—at least he hedges by saying that if we show him hat it was impossible for all the animals of the earth to get in out of the rain, he can still overthrow all Infidels by saying that the flood was local. That is the common knot-hole through which theologians now crawl, but it will be a good deal easier for the old-time camel to get through the eye of a needle than for them to get out of the muddle in that way. The Bible says, and we giv it for what it is worth, that "I, even I [God], do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and everything that is in the earth shall die." "All the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered." Now, if the highest hill in the world was covered, all the rest must necessarily hav been. Deltzch, an advocate of the partial flood theory, saw no way out of this difficulty but to suppose that the flood of water was ejected with such force from the fountains beneath that it assumed a conical shape. But he did not mention how it retained this shape when the force was spent. What a sight it must hav been to see this big cone of water, 17,000 feet high, with Noah's little three-story ark on top! If Mr. Smith believes the Bible in one thing about this story he must in others, and if he believes that the flood occurred he must believe that it was over the whole earth, for the Bible says so. If Mr. Smith can read, and we hav no reason to doubt it, by perusing the seventh chapter of Genesis he will find the statement not once, but several times, that everything upon, in, and on the earth died from the effects of the moisture then prevalent. And if he wants more evidence he can find it in the utterances of scientific men. Geology absolutely contradicts, shuts out even the possibility of, any such deluge within the historic period. According to Sir Charles Lyell no such flood has passed over the forest zone of Etna during the last 12,000 years; and the volcanic cones of Auvergne, which inclose in their ashes the remains of extinct animals, and present an outline as perfect as Etna, are older still. Kalish says: "Geology teaches the impossibility of a universal deluge since the last six thousand years, but does not exclude a partial destruction of the earth's surface within that period. The Biblical text, on the other hand, demands the supposition of a universal deluge, and absolutely excludes a partial flood." Hugh Miller, a Christian, said that the flanks of volcanoes of at least triple antiquity of the deluge exhibit no mark of denudation. He saw that his facts conflicted with the universal deluge theory, and he adopted the local flood one, but as it conflicts with the Bible, and if there was a flood at all it must hav been universal, he was left in a quandary. He had to disbelieve the Bible whichever theory he adopted. He spent a good deal of time trying to reconcile his Bible with his science, but never satisfactorily succeeded. Bayard Taylor and other distinguished archæologists state that Egypt presents abundance of proofs that it has uninterruptedly existed as a nation for more than twelve thousand years. China claims an equal antiquity. Can these facts be reconciled with the story of a universal flood less than five thousand years ago? The Egyptians had abundance of mummies, statues, inscriptions, paintings, and other representations belonging to a period much older than Noah's time. Lepsius, writing from the pyramids of Memphis, in 1843, said, "We are still busy with structures, sculptures, and inscriptions, which are to be classed by means of the now more accurately determined groups of kings in an epoch of highly flourishing civilization, as far back as the fourth millennium before Christ," or nearly two hundred years before the time of the ark. Chevalier Bunsen, in his elaborate and philosophical work on ancient Egypt, has satisfied many learned scholars, by an appeal to monumental inscriptions still extant, that the successiv dynasties of kings may be traced back without a break to Menes, and that the date of his reign corresponds with a time nearly thirteen hundred years before the time of the flood. Lepsius asserted, in the "Types of Mankind," that negroes and other Africanic races existed on the upper Nile at least 2,300 years before Christ; and as this would be less than fifty years from the time of the deluge, it would follow they could not hav been the progeny of Ham, interim sufficient not having elapsed for nations to hav sprung up."

We think we hav adduced enough to convince our friend that if he believes the Bible he must believe in a universal deluge, and we think we hav shown that a universal deluge has never occurred, consequently the Bible is mistaken. It is pretended that the person who wrote Genesis was directed by divinity, and to doubt the truth of the story is therefore to impugn God. The writer evidently thought and intended the impression that the waters covered the whole earth, and to say that God did not know how large he had made the globe is something we should think a good minister would not want to do. Mr. Smith evidently did not look ahead far enough to see that in contending for a partial flood he was running contrary to the Great I Am himself. Otherwise we cannot account for his presumption.

As for all things being possible with God, that is not so. We hav the testimony of the Bible (again we giv it for what it is worth) that he could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley of Ajalon, because they had chariots of iron. And the record intimates that he had some other little difficulty in various matters. But, getting away from scripture, we will just mention that God cannot make two hills without a valley between, nor can he make two things occupy the same space at once. If he could, he might hav got a few more animals into the ark.

If our friend will tell us what kind of a being he means when he says "God," we will tell whether we believe in him or not. If he means an anthropomorphic being who is everywhere and has neither center nor circumference, and yet is like a man in shape, we do not believe in it, because it is an impossibility. If it is such a being as is described in the Bible, with smoke coming out of his nostrils and fire out of his mouth, with feet like brass, and horns growing out of his hand, we do not believe in either. That is a monstrosity born of the brain of a lunatic. We hav never yet heard God defined so that we could believe in him, and we never expect to. We cannot prove that there are not men millions of miles long on Jupiter, but we don't believe it, and that is perfectly parallel with the God question. The burden of proof rests on those who assert the existence of God. Let them define their God and prove he exists and does what they say he does. The Bible God is an impossibility. If there is any other we do not know it.

In closing, we would assure our friend that we are a truth seeker, and in the matter of this ark story think we hav found it. And if he is really seeking for truth we think he will find it by perusing these columns. We are fully aware that THE TRUTH SEEKER is more fair than Christian papers. One of the great faults we find with the church is her unfairness, extending to cruelty. She has been unfair with everybody who opposed her. The Inquisition was a very unfair and one-sided institution; so were the autos-da-fé. The Bartholomew massacre was terrible in its unfairness, and so were all the murders which Christianity instigated and perpetrated. It is the glory of Infidelity that it never killed any one. Science never shed a drop of human blood, while faith has waded through blood and carnage for centuries, dragging along in her wake little Oregonian pastors who try to bolster up that which wiser men hav thrown to the winds long ago.

We trust our friend will wait, before sending us any more articles in defense of his pet religion, until his Christian papers publish some of them.

WE would call attention to a new work we hav just issued, "Voltaire in Exile." It is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced Life by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland, his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the Great, Catharine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, and fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world by his brilliant genius and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

We will fill orders as fast as they come, and hope to send off a good many. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

MANY friends are sending for the paper, saying they wish their subscription to begin with Mr. Bennett's first letter. To such we wish to say that it is impossible. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not stereotyped, so after the edition is exhausted we cannot supply back numbers. Let all who wish the letters complete subscribe to the "Round-the-World" fund and they will get them bound up in elegant book form, with two hundred or more illustrations. The list is not by any means full, and great pleasure will be taken in adding new names and crediting the "V's." There are also several who hav pledged who hav not sent in the money. We wish they would do so, as we need it, and also like to see stars all the way down the column. It will take a thousand subscriptions to pay the expenses of the trip, and we want them before the first volume is out, so as to get all the names in the dedication.

THE mill of F. D. Lacy, of Nirvana, Mich., burnt on the morning of September 8th, we learn has been rebuilt, and the party suspected arrested and bound over to appear at circuit court. It is a grave charge, and his guilt seems thoroughly established. We trust that justice will be meted out to him.

A TYPOGRAPHICAL error last week made us say that THE TRUTH SEEKER would be sent six months for fifty cents. It is not so. So large a paper cannot be afforded at that price, even with the hope of obtaining permanent subscribers. But we will send the paper to new subscribers on trial three months for fifty cents, trusting that when they hav read it that long they will want to continue. Any one who wishes to aid the Liberal cause cannot do it better than by sending the paper three months to friends who are likely to take an interest in the work.

WE recently received a call from Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Hiller, of Escanaba, Mich. They are traveling in search of better health, and also take all the pleasure they can. They were at the Hornellsville convention, and will be at the Chicago congress as they are on their way home. We are indebted to them for many courtesies, which we hereby acknowledge, and many pleasantly-spent hours. May their path always lie in the sunshine, with roses thickly besprinkling the way.

MRS. COLBY lectured in Germantown last Wednesday evening to a large and appretiativ audience. Mrs. Colby and Mrs. Smith closed their engagement in Philadelphia on Sunday, Sept. 25th, whence they go to Pittsburgh for the greater part of October and return to Philadelphia for November. Parties wishing their services will address them at 1,208 Mount Vernon street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE free stenografic class each spring and fall at Cooper Union, room 24, will open on Monday, Oct. 3d, at 8 P. M. For tickets apply to Mrs. E. B. Burnz, New York School of Phonography, 24 Clinton Place.

WE hav plenty more of those colored posters on hand which we will gladly send to any friend who takes enough interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER to aid in extending its circulation.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The full heart breaks to tears as through the night
The tremulous message of thy death is borne.
The toil is ended, and thy spirit brave
Is quenched at last in the black tide of death
That sweeps to victory o'er thy rigid form.
Hard fate, when life is blooming to its best,
When summer's wealth of honor is thy prize,
To feel the cold, dark winter on thy heart:
Earth's richest promis suddenly made bare,
And all its music turned into a sigh!

O life of man! so grand, and yet so frail;
So thrilling with the godlike, yet so quick
To sink into the dust and be no more;
A buoyant wave, and then the fleeting foam—
The tragedy no faith can change. Nor prayers,
Nor tears, nor passionate wish, nor strife,
Can make the gloom less gloomy than it is,
Or turn the stream of death to joyous bound.
We only can endure with dauntless breast,
And pluck the flowers that still must bloom along
The everlasting way of darkling fate.
There is no choice; but we must onward press,
And wear the crown or bear the heavy cross.
We weep, and with our sorrow become great,
And mourn the mighty dead with upright face.

Yet death is beautiful, for it will make
Thy memory, chieftain, like a lofty star,
Forever lovely and forever dear.
The tears that flow to-day shall set most bright
Thy name in the eternal thoughts of men,
Embalming it with precious effluence,
So that it crystals to most tender beams
Thy life's romance, its quick, eventful years,
The boy's large hope and manhood's spleedid deed.
The toilsome path to where the noblest shine
By this great woe are flooded to renown.
The burning heart of youth through endless years
Shall catch the fervor of heroic aim
From the poetic grandeur of thy life.
Through suffering thou hast plucked the rarest fruit;
The wreath of rich remembrance through all time,
To be a fireside story and sweet dream,
To liv in music and the rhythmic tale,
To touch the heart with genius' mystic spell.
Sorrow hath clothed thee with its jewels bright,
That softly shine through multiplying days,
And keep thy memory fresh as bending skies.
No honor crowns thee as our grief to-day;
It gives immortal ardor to thy face.

Book Notices.

PAUL HART; OR, THE LOVE OF HIS LIFE, by Uncle Lute, is a new romance of real life in America, from the prolific press of T. B. Peterson & Bros., Phil'a, Pa. Paper, 75 cts.; cloth, morocco, $1.25.

Many of our readers are acquainted with Uncle Lute through a perusal of his poems, one of which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER about a year ago, entitled, "Whipping Post in Delaware." From this fascinating romance before us we extract the following conversation, between Paul Hart, the self-thinking hero, and Lisette Lawrence, his beautiful sweetheart, who is a Christian. They are talking about their marriage, soon to take place, and Lisette suddenly changes the subject with:

"And Paul," now raising her eyes to his, "it would make me so happy to hav you take the step of which I hav so often spoken to you—to hav you walk the Christian's path with me."

"Now, darling," said he, suppressing her last word with a kiss," just see how many subjects you are introducing at once—marriage and religion. I hav often told you that I could not see with the light you profess to on this subject of blind belief, and ——"

"Yes, I know, I see I cannot be instrumental in bringing about your conversion; but you hav given me but vague excuses."

"Lisette, if you, whom I know and love, and enjoy, and realize a sa present truth, were the Christ of whom you speak, you might approach me on the subject of belief in an actuality with glowing success, for my faith penetrates the dark vale of past ages but to grasp possibilities and tangibilities in accordance with the light given me by the creator."

"And may not a man's understanding be cultivated with an eye single to one purpose?"

"For all I know, some may be able to whet their imagination up to that point where they will believe those evergreens out there on the lawn were once tomato plants, but I appear to be of a different make up. In the light I see it, to demand of sense a fellowship with nonsense would belie my conceptions of consistency, and for a man to enslave his reason by the power of imagination is base hypocrisy. Man has implanted within his being that which enables him to distinguish right from wrong, justice from injustice, purity from that which is base and unclean, and a heart to go out in love toward his fellow-men, if they be worthy of love, and ever charitable to all, be they what they may. I do right, Lisette, because it is right so to do, because I feel better with myself and better toward others. I believe in and worship the great spirit called God, in whose law there never grew seeds of error with a need of ever changing one iota of his plan. I love the woods, I love the flowers, the birds, the sunshine, and the dewy rain, and my soul pulsates in unison with each sweet sound God has made or his creation has produced, whether it be the prattling of a tender babe, the carol of birds, the gurgling of streams, the song of the factory spindle, the click of the mechanic's hammer, or the melody of your own divine rendering in song. But when you ask me to believe in an orthodoxical myth, to listen to voices that hav never been heard, and to play upon my imagination in affairs purporting to be of such vital importance, you ask me to immortalize my ignorance and insult my judgment."

"You should seek for light and faith to comprehend the great truths of Christ's plan of salvation, for he loves you, Paul, and one of his children almost dares to worship you. Oh, what a Christian you, with your gifts and attainments, might make were it not for your——"

"Infidelity, love. Say it; I will not feel insulted. To call a man an Infidel only means he is a self-thinker, an investigator, an arriver at conclusions through the possible laws of cause and effect, not blindly accepting some doctrin taught ages before science had formed the bud, which to-day blossoms with such vigorous enlightenment."

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL, AND THE IMMORTALITY OF ITS ELEMENTS. By A. Snider de Pellegrini. New York, D. M. Bennett. Second edition, corrected. Price 25 cents.

The author of this little work is a scientific writer of much versatility, and has written several works in the French and Italian languages, among which may be mentioned, "Les Mystères de la Creation devoiles," "L'homme et sa raison d'être," "Nouvelle Theorie sur le formation des comete," all works of interest. The title of the work now publsihed givs a good idea of its scope and object, and the following extract will enable the reader to judge of its merits:

It would be a great injustice to blame a man's religion because he follows a dogma different from ours. Every generation has inherited the creed of their fathers and ancestors, consequently the son is bound to follow the form of religion adopted by his parents, only he is bound also to respect, for the same reason, the creed followed by his neighbor upon reflection that it is only the forms of worshiping God that differ in their respectiv ceremonials, not the root (le fond), as the homages are, whatever form directed, all addressed to the one single divinity, which is the Almighty God, creator of the universe.

Martin Luther deserted the Catholic church because he was disgusted by the arbitrary acts by which the priest of his time was imposing on the people, and he established the Protestant church with liberal intentions; but to-day Catholicism in Italy, France, and Spain is liberal—everybody may employ Sunday as he likes. Protestantism, on the contrary, imposes constraint on the people.

THEY tried in the Presbyterian Criminal Court this week a Sunday-school teacher named Mrs. Cooper, on a charge of heresy. Can any one imagin a wilder lunacy than a set of so-called divines, pious elders, deacons, and ecclesiastical small fry, gravely discussing the orthodoxy of a woman who teaches a Sunday-school class of a hundred girls successfully, simply because she has once or twice been to hear Dr. Stebbins preach, and also because she is a cousin of Bob Ingersoll? A third charge is that she raised $500 for the "godless" kindergarten schools. The plaintiff is a Pecksniff or a Stiggins named Roberts, evidently a blue-nosed hypocrit, with a heart about the size of a small cod-fish ball.—San Francisco News Letter.

Progress of Liberalism the Past Year.

REPORT TO THE FREETHINKERS' CONGRESS AT LONDON.

Prof. A. L. Rawson, Secretary of the National Liberal League for 1879 and 1880, and a delegate last year from the Liberals of the United States to the Freethinkers' Congress at Brussels, made an extended and able report to the Congress on the state of Liberalism in this country. I need not go over the historical ground so well covered by that report, but just take up the story where Prof. Rawson left it, and giv an account of the progress of Liberalism during the past year.

The general secular press of the United States has kept steadily on in the progress of Liberal development. It has been more outspoken in favor of Freethought than ever before. Its solid, sober writers hav published more elaborate, candidly argued articles arraigning the church, and its wits hav shot more fanatic "folly as it flies" than ever before. The New York Times, one of the most staid, respectable, and venerable papers in this city, founded originally and for many years conducted by Henry J. Raymond, a very cautious and conservativ politician and Presbyterian, has, during the past year, astonished its readers and gladdened the heart of all Liberals by leading editorials, week after week, on ecclesiastic themes that before could only be found in the columns of downright Infidel papers. The New York Herald, Telegram, Sun, and Evening Post hav also, from time to time, stalked unceremoniously over premises where the priesthood had put up the warning, "All Infidel trespassers forbidden under penalty of the laws." The Boston Herald, the Boston Globe, the Cincinnati Commercial, the Chicago Times are similarly free and handle theological subjects with what used to be thought frightful audacity. Last of all a little one-cent daily paper named Truth was started in this city, something over a year ago, and has, in the shortest time ever known in the history of journalism, grown into a manifest and acknowledged success. Truth, among other principles of its platform, announced itself Liberal and Infidel from the start. It has traded on its Infidelity, set forth its claims to public patronage on account of its Infidelity, and won its success because of its Infidelity. This is encouraging to other journals and its success has set free many a pen among writers on other journals.

This liberality and freedom of the more general secular press, though of great value to the Liberal cause, militates somewhat against the spread of the so-called Infidel and Liberal journals. In general trade, when every shop sells boots and shoes the special shoe store finds itself curtailed of its sales. The same is true with concerns that supply the Liberal understanding. Such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, however, hav not only held their own, but hav made encouraging gains in their circulation. They are also doubly endeared to those who patronize them when they find their views adopted by their popular daily contemporaries.

The church, of course, writhes and is distressed under these increasing vollies from an unshackled press. Driven to retreat, she rushes to her last defenses, but finds no commanding hight on which to remount her damaged batteries; no eminence of inspiration so infallible that reason and science cannot explode it and make it very manifestly fallible. This demoralization, so palpable in the orthodox forces, reacts upon the press, and, emboldened by success, it pushes on and becomes still more merciless in its treatment of theologic shams.

While our population is steadily and rapidly increasing, the attendance at church is diminishing. There is a general complaint of empty pews. Pastors preach to bare walls. The churches are frequented chiefly by women to whose sympathies persistent appeal is made. Men of sense and reflection remain away. The church is hedged about with difficulties on every hand. While audiences are becoming more critical and require clearer proofs, deeper reasons for the doctrins that are preached to them, young men of thought, of brains, of ability capable of rendering such reasons, decline to enter the priesthood. Thousands of clergymen are out of employment, and yet thousands of pulpits are vacant because congregations are so critical that they will not employ any but first-class intellects. But the trouble is, the Lord's vinyard is mostly barren, producing nothing but sour grapes. A few great theological lights whose fervor and eloquence were kindled by the theoretical philosophy and fanciful metaphysics of half a century ago, yet remain tottering on the stage; but even the best of these are part heretic, part agnostic, and the best of their faith is a dim religious flocculency floating in the air. We hav a Beecher, a Thomas, a Collyer; and we hav a King, a Tyng, and a Swing; and of these, Tyng has left the pulpit in despair. He has gone out of the life-eternal line of business and gone into insurance of this life. After these are all gone, when shall we see their like again? Where is the Promethean heat that will succeeding lights like these illume? What would not the churches giv, if money could buy, or flattery entice, or promise of a heaven of delights could attract, for the tongue of Robert Ingersoll, or the pen of Herbert Spencer, or the research of Huxley, Darwin, or Tyndall, to at least try to lift them into the realm of reason, the company of the scientific elect, and bolster their theories of "the atonement," "retribution for the finally impenitent," and their general cosmical conceptions, yet a little longer?

An event of the greatest importance to the irreligious world has happened this year. The "inspired word" has been undergoing repairs, and it has just come out spic and span new. "In the beginning was the word, the word was with God, and the word was God." But, in the end, it turns out that the word was not God, never was with God, and gets out of style as easily as any old hat. Things hav been working to this end a long time. The word of God was getting shabbier and shabbier year by year. Believers everywhere were getting ashamed of a "word" so tattered and torn. The telescope, microscope, retort of the chemist, hammer of the geologist, and camera of the photographer hav been making discoveries and developing divine revelations, as well as those old prophets and apostles. These later revelations were of an order with which this "word that was God" found it difficult to compete. Hence the necessity for a revisal. Hence "the word was made flesh," in spots, to get away, as far as possible, from the spirit of the age and to concede some slight adaptation to the materialistic tendencies of modern times. But it is such a little outcome of wool for so great a cry! The minimum of pancakes is out of all proportion to the batter that was stirred up. Our father in heaven they continue to call "which." They interpolate "the evil one" into his prayer, and his "kingdom, power, and glory forever and ever" they revise out. The short and convenient "cuss word," "hell," is lengthened by a syllable, putting profane people to some inconvenience to revise their terms of imprecation, and this is all. It is enough, however, as a step. It is but a beginning. It has been a money-making speculation, and the old prophets will be mercilessly sacrificed to the new and more universally worshiped cash profits. Other revisions will follow. Gospel truth here will suffer excision, and a precept there emendation. A phase of doctrin here will be lopped off, and a word there substituted. Texts will be clipped worse than the coin of the realm, till finally they will get down to the last remaining grease spot of holy scripture, which will be this expressiv piece of a text, "Hang all the law and the prophets." The penalty for all these impious proceedings they treat as so much buncombe and bosh, as it probably is: "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book. And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy God shall take away his part out of the book of life and the holy city and from the things which are written in this book." These be fearful words, but the judge of all the earth don't mean them at all; and when the righteous are assembled at the last day before the judgment seat he will forgiv them their trespasses on his "word" as they forgiv those who trespass against them.

Our colleges and universities are filled with revolt against exploded dogmas and the superannuated inculcations of sectarian text-books. The younger professors are discontented, and impatiently await the shoes of the older theologians, who are fast dropping away. The truths of nature, as revealed in the scriptures of Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, Haeckel, Herbert Spencer, and other scientists are knocking at class-room doors, and student and tutor alike demand that they shall be let in. Prayers, chapel exercises, and all religious observances are becoming more and more odious, and the students more and more demand freedom of choice as to their observance.

Prayers also in our state and national legislatures —for many years a mere farce and hollow form— are now becoming an unendurable bore to almost the entire body of lawmakers. The correspondent of the New York Sun writes daily from the Capitol at Albany making fun of the prayers and describing the legislators as engaged in writing, reading, smoking, talking, and in anything but devoted attention to the prayer. Yet every Infidel must pay his share of the three dollars which every one of these prayers costs. This is a mockery too hollow to last long. The late World's Fair Commission, which promised so much and performed so little, opened its business meetings with prayer by its most active agent and commissioner, the reverend Newman. The public at once lost confidence in it, and the whole movement failed after a preliminary expense of many thousand dollars.

The usual number of clerical lapses from their own prescribed rigors of virtue hav occurred this year. The usual large majority of Christian criminals are in our prisons. The usual number of pious defaulters hav run away, even with funds of their own churches and Sunday-schools. The usual number of holy men hav loved their neighbor a great deal worse than themselvs, hav coveted not only his ox, his ass, and his maid-servant, but his wife also—yea, hav taken his life and been hung for it. The usual number of godly suicides, fallen into despair of this life, hav made violent entry into some supposed happier world beyond the grave. On the other hand, it is very rare to find a Freethinker led into unjust, immoral, or criminal ways of any kind or character.

The political parties, once well defined and planted on certain clearly out-lined platforms of principles, are now all at sea, chaos reigns supreme, faction strives with faction, bosses of gangs contend with captains of cliques. On the other hand, the masses are perplexed and know not where they belong. The very names of all these political sects are a revulsion and a fright to the honest citizen. "Stalwart," "Half-breed," "Feather-head," are the right, left, and center of Republicanism. "Tammanyites," "Readjusters," "Bourbons," and "Straightout" are Democratic factions, with "Independents" playing shuttlecock between them all. All these names are as meaningless as Choctaw and devoid of any principle but the spoils. The principles of all of them are identical in kind and the same in number—seven in all, namely, five loaves and two small fishes.

But amidst all this anarchy among professional politicians the people remain unmoved. Busy industry proceeds just the same. All wheels whirl, all hammers ply, all spindles turn, and production and consumption go on with ever increasing ratio. The people are thinking and acting independently of the politicians. New parties are forming and the old ones, allied with money and the priesthood, are finding themselvs undermined. The Greenback party is organized against a monopoly in money and banking. The anti-monopoly party is organized against a monopoly of rail and water transportation of freight and passengers. The Socialistic-Labor party is organized against a monopoly of land, machinery, and raw materials. The Liberal League is organized against a monopoly of divine favors, celestial privileges, blessing from the most high, and demands free trade in these prime necessities of daily life.

When all these parties hav worked out their claims and find that they can make no further headway alone, they will coalesce, pool their issues, and make one grand united party of progress against the party of immobility and reaction; and Freethought, the moral as well as the material well being of mankind, will be the gainer by it.

Exactly at this point in the writing of this report comes the shot against our President, heard all around the world and felt in every human heart. Here too the assassin is a Christian, his insanity first took the form of religion. He was originally a religious fanatic of the Freeman Pocasset type. Then, as religious excitement of the Moody and Sankey pattern died down and political excitement came up, his insanity shaded off into politics. His victim too is a Christian, and the same before-mentioned Dr. Newman, in his first succeeding sermon, demanded a universal raid on Infidelity to put down Freethought as a remedy for the shooting of Christian Presidents by Christian assassins. The Rev. Dr. Crosby proceeds to lecture on "Assassination and Infidelity," and both conspire to swear that the Infidel wolf it was that roiled the stream that runs up by the lamb of God.

But in the shock and terror of this great trouble the Liberals, Freethinkers, and men of progress in Europe and everywhere should reflect that the government of these United States is but one of the steps in the great march of progress. The freest vanguard of the race has halted here for over a century without a king exactly under that name; but, as the years go on and the experiment of this phase of Democratic government proceeds, it is discovered that too much of the monarchical principle remains in our one man President. It is not fit that one man should rule over so vast a territory, such tremendous financial interests, and so diverse and numerous a people.

The outcome of it is monopoly, centralization and ever-increasing spoils. This is becoming more and more obvious year by year, and the people are getting ready to clip this one man power, abolish the spoils, and make this still more a government of the people for the people and by the people. This will be to take another step in social, political, and governmental progress. How this will be done cannot be precisely stated in this paper, but it will be done, otherwise evolution will fail, progress will turn backward, and chaos and night come again.

It may, however, be suggested that the legislativ system of two houses in Congress and in every legislature will be greatly modified or abolished. Senates if retained at all will become more administrativ and less legislativ. The time will come when the President of the Senate, elected by the Senate, will be, by virtue of his office and only so long as he is president of the Senate, President of the United States. And his function as President will simply be to sign the papers and carry out the decrees of the Senate, without any veto power whatever. The supreme court, too, will probably be reduced to a law department of the Senate; the Senate itself may continue to be elected by the state legislatures, but the legislatures will be elected directly by the people. This will reduce the imperial, monarchical principle in our President to the smallest. It will also avoid our every fourth year convulsion of electing a President and our every sixteenth year cruelty of shooting him.

The Liberals of the United States are preparing to cope with these questions. It is their full and indefeasible right to take a share in their discussion and execution. Christian statesmen and Christian government having proved so manifest a failure, the anti-Christian citizens can fairlv demand a return to the principles of the Infidel fathers and founders of the republic, with such modern improvements as time, growth, invention, and development hav proved to be necessary to the just and efficient working of the original plans and principles. Least of all is Dr. Newman's raid on the Infidels in order as a remedy.

In the midst of all this political turmoil and the break-up of time-honored political parties stands the National Liberal League. This organization is intended to act, and does act, as a steadying, guiding, progressiv, and yet conservativ element. The League is young yet, having been organized only so late as 1876. It has had its accidents and adversities, but it grows, increases, survives through all; and its survival alone shows that it is in some degree fit. The National Liberal League is the only association in the United States organized on the line of Freethought to bring a Liberal, Infidel, and secular people to act together, to promote secular in opposition to ecclesiastical interests.

The National League is composed of Liberal associations, acting under its charter, affiliated in its work and meeting in their various localities throughout the United States. There are now two hundred and twenty of these chartered auxiliaries scattered through the several states of the union. The League is specially popular in the great free West. Miners and mining people take hold of it spontaneously. The League has not chartered as many auxiliaries this past year as in former years but it has consolidated itself, strengthened the affiliated societies it has already, and secured a larger revenue to its treasury than in any previous year. It has established a little monthly organ under the title of League Man, in which is published its official correspondence, reports of local societies, and such articles and documents as are of interest to the organization and promotiv of its welfare. The League holds an annual congress of delegates from the local societies usually in September. It has held five such congresses—the first in 1877 at Rochester, New York; the second at Syracuse, New York; the third at Cincinnati, Ohio; the fourth at Chicago, Ill. The Fifth Annual Congress was held this year on the 30th of September at Chicago, Illinois. Its immediate objects are to secure a just taxation of church property along with other property, exclude the Jewish or any other religious scriptures as an object of adoration and worship from the public schools, and to abolish the restrictiv laws that relate to Sunday and that prohibit citizens from spending one-seventh part of their time as they shall see fit. And generally its objects are to secure and maintain a complete and perfect separation of church and state.

Organization is now the hope of Liberalism in the United States. Organization, mutual help, joined shoulder to shoulder, is the order of the day. Even if it is no more than to count noses and exhibit our numbers, it will be a manifestation of power and a giving of notice that we are not to be trifled with. How much more if we organize for activ, enterprising, Liberal work! Just as the church waked up one time to the fact that "the devil had all the best tunes," so the Liberals of this country hav come to recognize the great truth that the church is what she is because she has the best methods of proselyting, instructing, and preaching her gospel to every creature; and, of these best methods, the one of chief value is organization. If the church were not organized into circuits, presbyteries, bishoprics, and dioceses she would be a rope of sand without cohesion and without power. With organization she is the powerful creature that she is notwithstanding the falsity of her doctrins. A small body organized around a lie is stronger for evil and for selfish ends than a multitude unorganized are for good, though they may hav immediate access to the fountain of truth and liv and act upon it in their daily, individual lives. While the devotees of lies are organized for the propagation of lies, the devotees of truth should come into counter-organizations to defeat error and defend and propagate the truth. This is what the National League is organized to do, and it is growing to be a success.

The preceding report of our able and devoted Secretary leads to two or three reflections which, under the light of our experience, ought to be submitted to Liberals at home and abroad:

1. That Liberalism is "in the air," and will appear from time to time in forms, shapes, persons, and places the most unexpected. Indeed, the general fact of the progress of the world makes their appearance inevitable. The Liberals are those who hav become free, that is, emancipated from theology. The facts and laws of civilization compel this emancipation more and more.

2. Shall this process of progress and enlightenment be the result of blind facts, forcing events and revolutions like the broken and dammed up ice in a mountain gorge, or shall the process of progress be anticipated by a wise prevision and provision, that will open the minds of men to the inevitable and make the rise and flow in the river of time and evolution peaceful, healthy, and natural.

3. This wise prevision and preparation can only be had by the wise and prudent spreading of Liberal, scientific, and humane views among the people. To do this, two things are necessary (1), careers for individuals; (2), organization.

That is to say, Liberalism must furnish a livelihood for its best teachers and exponents. The success of a cause that can furnish such careers is assured. The cause that cannot do it must remain suspended like vapor, "in the air," giving freshets here and lightning there, under the blind propulsion of revolutionary events. The revolution, if it is understood, organized, and manned, is gradual and safe; it is but another name for the growth and progress of man. But man cannot advance physically, morally, mentally, socially, and politically without limbs and organs.

(2). Back of these leaders, teachers, and editors there must lie organizations, intelligent, trusting, coöperativ, influential. The National Liberal League is one of these; it must be largely extended, and others must take up its work and aid in its efforts for emancipation, education, and social development; and, above all, aid in the defense of liberty against encroachment of both church and state, by securing the complete and permanent separation of both.

4. The last consideration is, that no Liberal can really be one until and unless he has an earnest desire to hav others enjoy the blessed emancipation from the horrors, dogmas, dreams, and despotism of theology from which he has escaped. He knows that this escape must be commonly a slow growth, not without the doubts and fears which always attend growth and progress. But he knows the joyous health and liberty beyond, and he longs to see all enjoy this blessed light. He knows, too, that only by that light can the progress of the world be other than a blind and dangerous groping and stumbling in the dark. It is evidently, therefore, the duty of every Liberal to secure his own life, family, and paying business, upon the most successful and permanent basis possible, from the point of view of worldly success, and then, to use of his means reasonably, and in proportion to his means for the wise support of the organization and the men who only can make Liberalism a beneficent power upon earth.

These reflections are forced upon us by the fact that Liberals so often take a pride in despising money and position, as so much filthy lucre and hypocrisy. If sought for themselvs, this is true. If sought as a power for good, it is the reverse of the truth. Unless the genius of Voltaire had been seconded by his wealth, he could never hav lifted Europe out of the dark ages. Honestly, honorably, industriously, therefore, "put money in thy purse," for money is the power that propels the world forward in her orbit of progress. Each must learn and be able to contribute to that power.

T. B. WAKEMAN, Treas., N. L. L.

But the Liberals of the United States in pushing their own enterprises do not lose sight of Liberal movements in Europe. They hav been profoundly interested in the struggle of the government with the church in France and the struggle of the church with Mr. Bradlaugh in England. Day after day, turning to the foreign news in the morning journals, the first items looked for hav been the latest developments from these two fields of religious warfare. Mr. Bradlaugh especially in being a personal sufferer from an injustice that could be conceived only in a Christian heaven and that would be scorned as too inhuman by all traditional devils that ever peopled the Christian hell, has been the center of universal interest and has had the sympathy not only of Freethinkers, but of many Liberal Christians in the United States. The National Liberal League, and Freethinkers generally, in this country send kindly greeting to their peers and comrades in Europe and to Mr. Bradlaugh and his gallant defenders especially. May he and they all win in their bitter struggle with the power of the church is the hope and belief, yes, and even the prayer in such a scientific way as prayer is sensible and permissible, of the millions of Freethinkers of the United States.

WRONG BECAUSE IT HURTS.—Nothing is wrong because it hurts deity or nature, but because it hurts man. Teach the people that laws are made for their protection, not as instruments of revenge, and their self-interest and gratitude will be excited. Thus the first step to solid and permanent reform will begin.

The Dogma of Immortality.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is no secret to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I am a Spiritualist, and hence I hope the ultra-Materialistic readers of your Liberal paper will bear with me, and, if necessary (to them), pity my apparent weakness, even if my skepticism is as great as theirs, and my knowledge in some matters greater. I hav preferred to write occasionally for your paper, knowing full well you hav a numerous amount of Spiritualistic subscribers who fully understand and appreciate the subjects on which I generally treat; I am therefore not surprised at the crude remarks of some of your contributors. It must therefore be understood that it is from this standpoint I generally write. It is simply from this position friend Lake misunderstands my recent contribution on our proper "foe."

In some former number of your paper I gave my views upon the much used, and, as I think, ignorantly handled subject of what is called "superstition." I endeavored to show how it is generally popularly denounced by most writers without even a logical examination of its true origin and character. I endeavored to show that the classic erections of Westminster, St. Paul's of London, St. Peters of Rome, and the ten thousand costly religious tabernacles in our own land, had the same common basis as the lowest species of fetish and idol worship of the most barbarous humans. I endeavored to show that all these latter mentioned creations were mere outgrowth of superstition and all this costly religious superstructure was based on a natural desire in man for a continued existence. I contended that the hope and expectation of a continued existence in some form was natural, and that skepticism in immortality was purely artificial, and was doubtless lashed into hatred by the fashionable ignorant assumptions of our dominant aristocratic priesthood.

If friend Lake will understand my last article (which he has in part quoted) he will perceive less inconsistency, I think, in my position than he now supposes. I said my "standpoint of knowledge." I can but infer his standpoint of knowledge differs from mine, or he would not hav written so childishly of the well-known claims of Spiritualism. He seems to overlook, or does not note the fact, that Spiritualism embraces all that is known of the scientific researches and speculations of Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, and Spencer, with the additional presumption that we Spiritualists know a little more.

Just glance at friend Lake's position. Here, attention to the subject of Spiritualism has existed for the space of thirty-eight years, or ever since its public notification through the press of the rapping phenomena at Hydesdale in this state, and its various modifications of table-tipping, independent writing, and entrancements, etc., and at this late day our friend Lake shows his ignorance of its conceded claims as an established fact by propounding questions worthy only of the dullest Sunday-school bigot of the union, and invites me to waste time in answering.

As I stated before in one of my former contributions to your paper, Spiritualism cannot be proved by mere pen controversy, and hardly by the mere statement of phenomenal facts, but mainly by a personal knowledge of facts connected with their corresponding intelligence. This is a peculiarity all advanced thinkers long since observed. The only utility in these public statements of phenomenal facts (many of which I hav given through your paper) should be that they might act as an encouragement to others, if they felt inclined to giv the subject a personal examination. To me it seems a waste of time to attempt to argue the truth of the soul's immortality with minds of friend Lake's comprehension. He is so crudely Materialistic I am afraid he would hardly understand me were I to say I also am a Materialist, but that my Materialism was of too refined a character to yield to the powers of the microscope.

We can all commiserate the fate of the poor castaway sailor on one of the tropical islands in the Pacific. He readily won great distinction and influence with the savage emperor by his more civilized suggestions, and being also possessor of a rusty nail wherewith to bore holes for the construction of their tents and bark canoes. But unfortunately he told them a truth, far beyond their savage comprehension. Wishing to giv them an idea of ice he told the emperor he had seen sheets of water in his country so hard that men could readily walk and run on their surfaces. This truth, so far from the emperor's plane of knowledge or conception, nearly cost the mariner his head, and from being, as before, almost deified, he was branded as a liar of the first order. Now, believing friend Lake to be an honest lover of truth, he must conceive us Spiritualists to be liars and frauds of the worst kind.

But, the question will arise, Is this earthly existence, with its tantalizing hopes of unrealized happiness, a place of torment, an absolute hell, or is mankind only in an evolutionary state preparatory to something higher? I can only reiterate that I conceive that he or she entertaining the belief in annihilation can be neither philosopher nor philanthropist.

But let me narrate what is claimed for the divine or miraculous paternity of Merlin, whose city I have seen: King Vortigern, who lived in Wales near the close of the fifth century, being in great trouble about the foundation stones of a castle which he wished to build, and which stones sunk into the earth out of sight as fast as they could be put in place, called together the bards and wizards of his locality—and they were the priests and prophets of those times—to tell him what he should do. They gathered together at his command, and consulted long among themselves; and not finding any natural or supernatural reason why the stones on a hill should sink into the earth, to cover their ignorance and save their credit, they put the king off with what they considered an impossibility by saying that "those stones could never be laid together and remain where placed till cemented with the blood of a man-child who was born of a mother but had no man for father." This answer satisfied the king, and he sent trusty servants abroad over the country to find a woman who had borne a son without the agency of a father. They were extremely fortunate, for after a few days' search in several villages they found at Caer-Merlin (which implies Merlin's town, and from which Carmarthen is said to have come) a virgin, the daughter of King Demetius, who had borne Merlin, and who, according to her own statement, had known no man. When she and her boy were brought before King Vortigern he made inquiry of her as to the paternity of the lad. She replied that the boy was a natural son of her body, but at the same time protested that she had never had the society of mortal man, and that the only company she had had was a spirit, who assumed the appearance of a beautiful young man, who often appeared unto her, seeming to court her with an uncommon warmth of affection, and when any of her fellow-virgins came in he would suddenly vanish, she evidently being his only choice. She asserted that by his many and urgent importunities she was at length overcome and yielded herself to his wishes, and was embraced and caressed and fervently pressed by him, and as the result of all this the child Merlin was born. Her words were uttered with such modesty and humility that the king was satisfied she told the truth, and he gladly accepted Merlin as just the person he was looking for.

It is perhaps not strange that a child begotten under such remarkable circumstances could prophesy what should befall the kings for many hundred years to come, and that what he uttered should come truthfully to pass. I have the book containing these prophecies in crude poetry, as they were translated from his version, but I will not detain you to listen to them now, as they are too lengthy for this letter; but I wish to assure you that they appear nearly as good as any prophecies I have ever read, save Mother Shipton's, which is now shown she did not write at all. And as for the claims of Merlin's remarkable paternity, I beg to assure you that it is better authenticated than any similar account of the kind that has come down to us, for here we have the assurance of the mother herself as to how the matter occurred, while in some of the other cases, including the one in Palestine, we are entirely left without the testimony of the mother, who, it must be confessed, is the most direct and important witness in the case. I wish now to assure you that I believe this story about the supernatural parentage of Merlin just as much as I do the others I have mentioned, because I have read it in a book written and printed before I was born, and because I have seen the city where the child was brought into the world, which was named after him, and because the cave is hard by and is pointed out where he used to resort to obtain his inspiration and learn how to prophesy.

It was at Carmarthen that considerably later the Rev. Peter Williams lived, who translated the Bible from the original Hebrew and Greek into the Welsh language, more correctly than any other translation that has been made. After completing it he was requested by the Methodists to modify certain portions so as to agree with the Calvinistic doctrines, but he flatly refused, on the ground that he considered the Bible far more the true authority than Calvin. For this he was suspended—not by the neck, but from his office as a preacher, and was denounced as a heretic, as the church has similarly done in numerous other cases.

It would be pertinent here, as Wales was long the stronghold of dissent, to trace the origin of the sects which arose here, to state that on St. Bartholomew's day, Aug. 24, 1662—199 years ago—four thousand clergymen seceded from the church of England and founded the Dissenter's Independent or Puritan sect in a manner quite similar to that in which the church of England dissented and withdrew from the church of Rome under the reign of Henry VIII. I might also show how Romanism was established by William the Conqueror and his able coadjutor, Lafranc, bishop of Normandy; how Lafranc's was the brain that conceived the pernicious law of entail, as well as other laws which held the people of Great Britain subjects of those Norman bandits; but I must hasten on. Let me say, however, before leaving Carmarthen, that it has been the birthplace of many distinguished men who have aided in forming the history of this country.

An hour's ride through a pretty fine country brought the train to Swansea, a great place for coal mining, iron manufacture, copper and silver smelting, etc. It is also an active seaport, and has a bi-weekly or tri-weekly line of steamers to America. It has a large trade with Chili in South America. Here the silver and copper are made ready for the market. Here are the capitalists and back-bone of Chili. From this point went the resources and strength which Chili recently developed in her war with Peru. It has been a surprise to many how a little strip of territory like Chili could possess power enough to whip two such countries as Peru and Bolivia. The fact is, Swansea was to Chili what Liverpool was to the Southern Confederacy.

I visited the extensive Siemen's steel works, perhaps the largest in the world, and saw more furnaces, more heavy steam hammers, probably still larger than I had seen before, more heavy rolling mills, etc. Here they roll out steel plates of all thicknesses, railroad iron, thin steel sheets for tinning, bolts of all sizes, together with many other kinds of work. I saw a pair of shears for cutting rolled steel and iron, the knives or blades of which were twenty feet in length. I had not time to visit the smelting works of silver and copper. About 200,000 tons of copper ore are smelted in the different furnaces in this vicinity. The copper works and other manufactories are situated alongside the river Tawe, about a mile and a half from the city, and the atmosphere is so beclouded and vitiated by the fumes of copper, sulphur, arsenic, etc., that the face of the country, largely deprived of its verdure, is rendered barren and unsightly. It is claimed, however, that the health of the working people is not injuriously affected, and that a full average proportion of them attain an old age, though it would seem that the noxious fumes which are so injurious to vegetable life would inevitably have an unfavorable effect upon human life. The whole place is black with smoke and soot—worse than our Pittsburgh, because the atmosphere is damper and more easily overcast. As a place of commercial and mechanical activity there are few places of its size that anywhere near equal Swansea. Its population is over 60,000, and is growing. I will mention one thing I saw here. In this country, as in England, Scotland, and Ireland, railroads in crossing each other never do so on the same level, but one is far enough above the other to admit the lower train passing under the upper road. It is the same with roads for wagons, they are not allowed to cross on a level with railroads, and hence collisions and accidents at railroad crossings are impossible; viaducts are therefore extremely common. Here in Swansea, I saw one railroad thus crossing another and below the two a canal with loaded boats passing. I cannot say how long the canal is, but I judge a good many miles, as I have seen it several times; but it is not large enough for boats of half the size of ours on the Erie canal. In the matter of railroad crossings I think Americans should adopt the European style; it is vastly safer than ours.

On our way from Swansea we passed through a pretty, productive country, and saw several pretty villages. Neath, however, is the first place of considerable size we came to. The Neath Valley is decidedly beautiful. Here live the stock from which Oliver Cromwell sprung. The next place of note is Merthyr, a town of considerable size, once a very busy place, but now suffering from stagnation, arising from the failure and stoppage of heavy iron manufactures. Perhaps thousands of skilled workmen who once wrought here have gone to America and materially added to our prosperity in the working of coal and iron, while the once busy establishments of Merthyr are going to decay. This is a wild country, with precipitous ranges of hills and narrow, winding valleys, with, of course, much of picturesque scenery.

Here it was amid these hills that the wild Irish clans made raid and foray, and many a hard battle was here fought. Here the Dissenters were hunted by the regular church, as the Covenanters were pursued in Scotland, and the place abounds with historic memories. Here Trevethick and Vivian built the first locomotive in 1807, long before Stephenson. The Dowlais Iron Works, here situated, are said to be the largest in the world. Yes, the useful element which has played such an important part in developing the iron and coal industries of the United States was drawn from this locality. About the middle of the last century Mr. Anthony Bacon, a man of much activity and energy, having obtained a long lease of a large tract of iron and coal country, entered into a contract with the government for supplying the arsenals with cannon and iron. Great works were erected, which rapidly diffused industry and attracted population. After acquiring an immense fortune, Mr. Bacon disposed of the tract in separate leases to various parties. The largest portion in the immediate neighborhood of Merthyr went into the possession of Mr. Crawshay, whose spirit and intelligence soon raised the operations in iron to such magnitude and perfection that Merthyr became the most celebrated spot for iron manufacture in the kingdom. Four large establishments were in active operation, with fifty blast-furnaces, and turning out over three hundred tons of iron per week. But this has all changed. Bad counsels ruled, a conflict arose between capital and labor, manufactories in other places sprang up and took the trade, Merthyr lost her market, and America profited by obtaining her skilled workmen.

The gentleman here to whom I had a letter, and another whom I wished to see, were both absent from home, so after looking over the town more than an hour, I took the train down the narrow Taff Vale to Pontypridd (pronounced Pontypree), arriving just as the evening shades were spreading over the vale, and in the rain, as a matter of course. My object in visiting this point was to see Mr. Evan Davies, the Arch Druid of the British Islands, who resides here. I inquired for his residence, some half a mile off in the upper end of the village, and set out in the dark to find him. When I reached his house I plied the knocker, but with no response, and feared I had lost my journey; but some little boys told me that while the son was away the old man was home and had just gone to a neighboring grocery. They went for him, and soon he was there. I remarked that I had come a long way to see him.

"From what country?" he inquired.

"America."

"Ah, then you are Mr. Bennett, the Bradlaugh of America!" at the same time extending his hand.

"Yes, my name is Bennett, but I am hardly worthy to be called the Bradlaugh of America, though I have tried to do what I could in my way."

He invited me in, and, seated by his genial fire, we were soon engaged in conversation on the old religion of the Druids and the false claims of the current system. It seems a friend in New York has written to Mr. Davies with regard to myself, and has sent him some copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He spoke in the most complimentary terms of the work I am performing, wishing me all possible prosperity. Mr. Davies, otherwise Myvgr Morganwg, his Druidic or Welsh name, is a genial, intelligent man of eighty-two years, and has been the most active man in the British Isles in perpetuating the Druidic faith, which he holds to be far superior to the Christian religion. He has spoken Welsh the greater part of his life, and it is not easy for him to express himself in English. He has written and published several books upon Druidism and the "Glory of Wales," but they have all been printed in Welsh. The series of articles under the title of "Ecce Diabolus," which lately appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, were translated from his pen. He is evidently a man of first-class intelligence and of extensive learning. It is easy to see, too, that he has a genial disposition, and that goodness and kindness of heart are his predominating characteristics.

He has a peculiar arm-chair, with symbols carved upon it, and somewhat like a throne, made for him to sit in when acting in the capacity of Arch Druid. I had the honor to sit in it. He informed me that Mr. Bradlaugh had visited him, for whom he entertains a very high respect. In the course of our conversation on the origin of religions, etc., he made this observation, which struck me with special force, and as being strictly true, "Christianity is one of the greatest falsehoods the world has known, and an uncounted number of falsehoods have been used to sustain it." He several times reverted to the work in which I am engaged and expressed his approbation of my efforts, at which, of course, I felt highly flattered.

I inquired of him as to the Druidic temple in the vicinity, remarking that I wished to visit it in the morning. He pointed out the direction of it on a neighboring eminence, and said that but for his age and feebleness he would accompany me to it in the morning. I thanked him, and assured him I would be able to find it, observing that I should rise pretty early in the morning and visit it before breakfast, so as to be able to take the early train for Cardiff. After detaining him as long a time as I considered reasonable, I bade him good-night, agreeing that I would call again upon him in the morning after visiting the Druidic temple, and exchange pictures with him, as I wished his. I soon reached the hotel, and it was but a short time before I was abed and asleep.

I was up betimes in the morning, as I had a mile or more to walk to reach the old meeting-place of the Druids. I had to cross the river Taff, over which William Edwards, an ingenious, self-taught mason of the village, was employed to construct a bridge about one hundred and forty years ago. He first constructed one with three arches, but it was soon swept away by the floods; then he determined to build another with a single arch, but this was scarcely completed when it fell in, the great weight of the abutments causing the arch to spring in the center. In his third trial he reduced the weight by introducing cylindrical openings or tubes in each side of the arch, securing greater stability with a diminution of material, a principle which has since been employed in the construction of other bridges in Wales. It is considered a remarkable bridge, its single arch being one hundred and forty feet, and its hight from the spring to the keystone thirty-five feet. It served to give a name to the village, for Pontypridd means a bridge of beauty. To prevent its falling again, the arch is made very crowning, necessitating a steep ascent to cross it from either side. For this reason a more modern level bridge has been built by the side of it, which has taken all the travel. Under the arch is said to be a remarkable echo which repeats itself nine times, but I did not investigate it. I hardly had time, and an echo repeated five or six times does me just as well as a dozen. I pushed on for the Druidic temple on the hill, and fortunately took the right road. As I was climbing the hill on one side the sun was climbing the other, and when I reached the ancient religious temple we stood face to face. When I realized that the religious and intelligent Druids thousands of years ago used to gather upon this hill, with the beautiful Taff flowing by its precipitous side, two or three hundred feet below, a feeling of awe came over me, a consciousness that I was standing upon "holy ground." The feeling that the ancients used to come up here and worship the sun, and my own gladness to see the sun once more, whose face had been many days hidden, but was now so full and fair before me, made me worshipful, and I took off my hat and bowed reverently to the glorious orb, and said:

"Great source of light, heat, and life, I hail you with gladness as I stand upon this sacred spot of earth, made sacred thousands of years ago by the honest sons of this island who reverently met here to do honor to thee, thou supreme ruler over this world and the entire system of planets, asteroids, and satellites within thy influence. I thank thee and the atmosphere around me that thou dost not hide thy face from me this beautiful morning. I recognize thee as the great, beneficent, and overruling power which controls the destinies of all the forms of life on this globe, and the author of life, sensation, motion, thought, and all the qualities and abilities possessed by various forms of vegetable and animal life. Without thee none of these could exist. Without thee eternal night, frost, and nihility would exist where are now countless millions of sentient and happy beings. However much praise may be accorded to the conceptions and creations of illy-informed minds, however much praise and worship may be extended to them which far more rightfully belongs to thee, still thou dost not take offense thereat; thou dost not withdraw thyself from the inhabitants of this earth because they run after other and inferior gods. Notwithstanding they speak falsely and say thou wast made of nothing less than six thousand years ago, and all within the space of a few hours (for thyself, the moon, and millions of other suns and worlds are said to have been made in a single day), thou takest no offense at these ignorant falsehoods, but constantly rollest on in thy beauty greatness, grandeur, and magnificence, dispensing thy blessings the same, hour after hour, day after day, month after month, year after year, century after century, millennium after millennium. Foolishly do short-sighted mortals say that thou wast created but six thousand years ago, and that prior to that time thou hadst no existence, for every atom of matter of which thou art composed is eternal in its nature and has not only existed thousands of years, but millions, trillions, quintillions, and decillions of ages. Yes, thou art eternal! Thou hast existed forever!!! Well am I convinced that not one atom of matter has ever been created from nothing and never can be, and sure am I that not one atom of matter can be converted into nothing—matter which is the eternal, the supreme, the most high, both uncreatable and indestructible. I know not whether it is true of thee, as some scientists assert, that thy substance in a highly diffused and heated condition filled the orbit of Neptune, the outer planet, and that with the great centrifugal force combined with inherent and convulsive power, the outer planet was first thrown off, and, like thyself, assumed a spherical form, the next planet following suit, and the next, and the next, until all the planets, asteroids, and satellites — over two hundred in all—down to Mercury were separated from them and each took up their line of march, revolving in ceaseless orbits around thy far greater self forever, whilst thou also revolvest around some other vast body, doubtless thousands of times larger than thyself. Whether this theory is true, or, as others assert, that thou ever maintained thy present size and condition, and that the numerous bodies revolving around thee from all eternity revolved around thee as they do to-day. I know not, but of this I am sure, that thou wast never nothing, and thou wast not created by any being which has no existence save in the darkened and ignorant imaginations of men. The fact that thou existeth to-day and must exist to-morrow is the assurance to me that thou hast existed forever, from all eternity, and thy existence must continue forever to all coming time. Great art thou, O Sol! Great are thy attributes and power! Great is thy influence for good—for transcending the potencies of all the gods and divinities which men in the ignorant ages of the past devised, and which enlightened men of the present time believe in. Hail to thee, O Sun! I bow in reverence before thee. I own thee superior to all other existences within thy system. I devoutly acknowledge thee the supreme power that rules on high. There is none greater than thee; there is nothing superior to thee. As the ancients worshiped thee on this very spot of ground, so do I now worship thee, and the glorious universe of which thou art a part, now and here this lovely morning."

I must confess I am unable, if worshiping is to be done at all, to see any object, real or imaginary, more fitting to worship than the controling orb of the solar system, from which we obtain life, sustenance, health, and happiness. I cannot see why the worshipful mind should look farther than this supreme power, or conceive, imagine, or invent any other being or monster to take its place as an object of worship. In this view I have regarded the ancient sun-worshipers as quite as sensible as any class that has lived, and far more so than the worshipers of Brahma, Ormuzd, Tien, Baal, Chemosh, Osiris, Vishnu, Jupiter, Odin, Yahweh, Allah, Taaora, Mumbo Jumbo, or any of the other divinities which men have devised, and which have no existence save in their misdirected imaginations. True, the most of these were originally clumsy and distorted personifications of the god of day; and the personal attributes, the passions, the loves, the hates, and the fierce anger were simply the distortions of other minds, or the crude way they adopted of expressing the power and fierceness of the sun's rays, and which in its evolutions, in the minds of uneducated and uncivilized men, degenerated into angry, fickle, and unreasonable monsters. It is by no means difficult to see that the Jewish Yahweh or Jehovah conformed to this general rule, and that he was originally a sun-god, or a god of fire. Such passages from the Jewish Scriptures as these make it pretty clear: "The sight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire" (Ex. xxiv, 17); "There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and his excellency on the sky" (Deut. xxxiii, 26); "Extol him that rideth upon the heavens, by his name of Jah, and rejoice before him" (Ps. lxviii, 4); "To him that rideth upon the heaven of heavens, which were of old; lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice "(Ps. lxviii, 33); "Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters; who maketh the clouds his chariot; who walketh upon the wings of the wind" (Ps. civ, 3); "His going forth is from the end of the heavens, and his circuit unto the ends of it, and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof" (Ps. xix, 6); "Our God is a consuming fire" (Deut. iv, 24); "God come from Teman, and the Holy One from Mt. Paran. Selah. His glory covereth the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. And his brightness was as the light" (Hab. iii, 3, 4); "His body was like beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire" (Dan. x, 6); "His throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire" (Dan. xii, 9, 10); "And there came a fire from the Lord, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense" (Num. xvi, 35); "Mount Sinai was altogether in a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire" (Ex. xix, 18); "And there came out a fire from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering and the fat" (Lev. xix, 24); "The mountains melted from before the Lord, even that Sinai from before the Lord God of Israel" (Judges, v, 5); together with many similar passages. Some of these quotations are in figurative and poetic language, but they convey a fair idea of the writers of the power of the sun and of fire, his symbol and representative, in keeping with the knowledge of the sun and its motions then possessed.

But let me leave the sun for the time being and describe this old Druidic open-air temple. I will begin in the center and work outward. In the center there is a logan, or rocking-stone, having a large rock with a flat upper surface for the rocking-stone to rest upon. The latter is a huge stone, ten feet across, spherical on the under side, like the half of a huge egg. It stands upon its apex, and is so evenly balanced that it is said to once have rocked by the hand of a child, but small stones have been thrown in by children or others in a way to block the rocking-stone and prevent its moving. The clacha-brath, or rocking-stone, must weigh several tons, and it is a marvel how it was placed in its present position. I am not aware that it is now known what was the office of the rocking-stone, but it evidently had its use, for several of them have been found in various parts of Wales, Ireland, and Brittany, where Druidism once flourished.

Around the rocking-stone, in a circle some forty feet in diameter, stand twelve upright stones, planted firmly in the earth, and outside of this, and some ten feet from the inner circle, is a larger circle of stones, planted in a similar manner, and three feet high. The stones in this circle I think are nineteen in number, and are said to have been placed where they are at a comparatively late date. The Druidical circles usually contain twelve or nineteen stones; the twelve is said to conform to the twelve signs of the zodiac. Here the gorsedds of the Druids were held, and here they met to hold their most sacred and solemn ceremonies, as the ancient Persians, three thousand years ago, used to assemble upon the tops of their mountains to worship the sun and perform their religious rites.

There were many points of similarity between Druidism and the ancient religions of central Asia. Both were emphatically nature-worship; the devotees of both worshiped in the open air and on the top of eminences and mountains; both worshiped the sun as the central and supreme power, the source of light and life; both were familiar with the motions of the planets and the twelve signs of the zodiac; both were opposed to idol-worship, and regarded nature as the supreme power. It is usually thought that the Druids, or rather, the earlier settlers of the island of Britain, came from Asia and brought with them the religion and worship which they had there believed and practiced. There are others, again, who claim that the inhabitants of Britain are even older than the Hindoos and Persians, and that Asia was absolutely settled by emigrants from this part of Europe. One thing going to confirm this theory is the fact that the Rig Vedas, the oldest known human writings, contain reference to the "White Isle" in the northwest, and of the people who come from there and brought with them into the land of the Aryans the religious beliefs peculiar to both people. This White Isle is supposed to mean Britain, so called from its chalky bluff shores, which of course look white as far is they can be seen out at sea. That both peoples had many things in common in their belief there are many proofs to confirm, philological and otherwise. I will name one. In the Druidic belief Menw (pronounced Manoo or Menno) was the first man created, and from whom descended all the nations and tribes of men. The Hindoos believed that Menu—pronounced almost exactly in the same way—was the father of the human race. Many of the words used by both people have similar sounds and meanings. Another proof of the great antiquity of the Druids is found in the fact that the German excavator and antiquarian, Dr. Schliemann, when digging where the ancient city of Troy stood in Asia Minor, found seven different strata, upon which seven cities had successively been built. As the last was destroyed three thousand years ago the great antiquity of the lowest city may be imagined. But however great its age may be supposed to be, Dr. Schliemann there found Druidic symbols.

The ancient Grecians had much to say of the Hyperboreans, by which they undoubtedly meant the inhabitants of Britain, where the great temple of Apollo (the sun) existed. Diodorus Siculus quotes Hecatæus, 600 B.C., as authority that Latona was born among the Hyperboreans, hence her son Apollo was highly esteemed among them. The Hyperboreans lived in an island not smaller than Sicily and situated in the ocean beyond and opposite to Gaul, under the constellation of the Great Bear (meaning far to the north). The Great Circle, Temple of Apollo (Hill of Sages), was there, and near by was a city whose inhabitants were mostly harpers, who played and sung in this temple in the worship of Apollo (Hu, the sun). Then he enjoyed himself among them, playing upon his lyre and dancing from the holiday of Albon Eilei (vernal exquinox) till the rising of the starry tower at the end of summer; and the language resembled the Athenian. The Greek mythology teaches that from among these Hyperboreans Apollo came to institute the oracle and tripod of Apollo at Delphi; and the first responses given there were through Olen (Alwain), prophet of the sun. Apollo was a Titan, as were all the Hyperboreans. Tacitus also gives an account of these people. By him Apollo is represented with his Discus; Vishnu as throwing his chacra (quoit), and Arthur as doing the same and instituting round tables, that is, organizing gorsedds all over the known world—building circle temples. When Julian, the apostate, tried to revive Apollo worship the only response he obtained was, "Roofless are the temples of God; no more he dwells on earth;" "Howbeit he dwelleth not in temples made with hands." When the religion degenerated to cave worship and Mithraitic rites, as roofed temples, it no longer was symbolic of Hu, the summer sun, but of the powers of darkness, death, and hell, as represented by winter. It will perhaps be remembered that Homer speaks of Ulysses going to the Thebian Bard Terescus. Thebes was a Druidic city.

It is also well known that the opinions upon many subjects held by the Druids and by the ancient Grecian philosopher Pythagoras, who lived nearly a thousand years before the Christian era, and who went into Egypt to learn philosophy and religion, were almost identical. Both believed in the immortality of the soul, both believed in the doctrine of metempsychosis, and both agreed perfectly in many other particulars. Whether Pythagoras learned of the Druids or whether the Druids were the disciples of Pythagoras is rather difficult, at this late date, to decide.

That there were inhabitants on the island of Brit-

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

CONCLUSION.

As the Bible opens with defaming woman (Eve), so it ends, as it begins, by fastening upon her the most odious epithet applied to her sex. All through its sacred pages we find such an ignoring of her individuality, such a disparagement of her nature, such perversion of her functions, such prostitution of her sexuality as woman and mother, such nonentity of her affections as maid and wife, that we are not surprised to read in the Apocalypse that she is selected as a type of the apostate church, under the appellation of harlot. We are informed in that unrevealed revelation, chapter xii, that "there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars: and she being with child cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered. And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born. And she brought forth a man-child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she had the place prepared of God, and the dragon persecuted the woman, and to her were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly from the face of the serpent."

Now the commentators have been very busy with this vision, giving numerous interpretations of its nonsense, the most acceptable of which is, the woman represents the true church, the dragon the devil, and the man-child "Christ," "the son of God," "the husband of the church," and various other significant titles. In their tergiversations here and hereafter they so confuse themselves and their readers as to leave no doubt of their utter inability to reach the author's meaning, even had he an idea of what he was seeing and transcribing. But no matter for that, enough is gained to give woman a thrust by using her as a symbol of the abominations of the Romish church typified as ancient Babylon. Again, we read, chapter xvii, that one of the seven angels showed John the judgment of "the great whore that sitteth upon many waters, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabiters of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication." John says, "I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet-color, and decked wtth gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: and upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus."

As the woman in chapter xii by commentators is declared a type of the church while faithful, so is this same woman, here called the mother of harlots, said to be a symbol of the apostate church. Be that as it may, woman perverted is used as the symbol instead of man perverted. Man has always chosen woman as the scape-goat of crime instead of acknowledging his own guilt, and has made her sex the synonym of wickedness. Adam, or the fable author, used fifteen words to criminate God, his alleged maker, woman, his helpmeet, and to excuse himself. "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree;" while his own confession, rapidly uttered, required but three words—"I did eat," containing only seven letters. Did he not then and there easily get over that difficulty, and has he not ever since? We find woman also excusing herself and casting the blame upon the serpent, but when the old dragon was called and cursed by God, he never so much as opened his mouth to accuse others or justify himself. Which of the quartette in this holy farce—man, woman, the serpent, or God—displayed the most magnanimity, judge ye?

Had woman written the Bible or been inspired by a female God to indite it, is it presumable that she would have made Adam her tempter instead of Eve his, and put into her mouth, "The man whom thou gavest to be with me, he gave me of the tree, and I did eat," or would she have taken the blame on herself? Would she have symbolized the apostate church and Rome, the typical Babylon, as a male prostitute? The fact that man wrote the book explains why these indignities are put on the female sex instead of the male. Would woman have done the same? We can never know, but should she ever subject man to a tyrannical will we may judge she would have done as did he, and if in the present and future she is and should be inclined to cast the blame of their mutual mistakes solely on him, then may we judge the ancient Eve would have done the same as did and has done the ancient and modern Adam.

But to return. In regard to the 144,000 which were redeemed from the earth (chap. xiv, 4) our revelator boasts, "These are they which were not defiled with women, for they are virgins." One knows not how to comment on such a statement. Women reckoned as cattle, so filthy as to be unfit to be approached by their husbands for three days previous to their going up to the mount to receive the commandments, would necessarily defile virgin men in their purity. Nevertheless, Jesus was born of a woman, and every man has had a woman for his mother, not even excepting God himself, though a woman is too filthy for him to become defiled with as a wife. All such statements are odious in the eyes of woman and an abomination in the sight of man—all men who are worthy of the name.

Woman is so misrepresented in the "sacred" volume that men are led astray as to her organism, desires, passions, and affections, and they estimate her sexually as not their counterpart, but judge her even more passionate, more artful, and more ready to sacrifice chastity, honor, and fidelity than are they; hence their bitter disappointment after marriage to find their wives less amorous than affectionate, and more faithful than themselves. The Bible stories of woman's anxiety for offspring is at this very hour misleading many a man to suppose that she then and now desired and craves amatory embraces more than children, and, if the latter, for the gratification only of her passions.

Since these articles began in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the writer has been thus informed on this point and requested to make this statement and draw attention to this fact, viz., the surprise and disappointment of men and husbands upon ascertaining the predominance of affection over amativeness in women and wives, due to the false teachings of the Bible. Sarah, Lot's daughters, Rebecca, Leah, Rachel, Judah's daughter-in-law, Hannah, Ruth, and other Bible women, whose anxiety for offspring is represented so great as to defy all law, order, and decorum, are cited by men as a proof of woman's greater amativeness and attraction towards the opposite sex for the sole purpose of gratification and procreation. This is a mistake. Woman anciently, and especially by the Hebrew nation, was only valuable as the mother of a "man child," and in order to gain favor in the eyes of her husband the wife would hire him with her son's mandrakes to lie with her, that her more successful rival sister in his affections might not gain an advantage over her by bearing him numerous sons. Censure not, then, these women too harshly if to secure a lesser or larger share of the affections or attentions of their polygamous lords, they practiced device to attract them to their arms, or made extra efforts, like the daughters of Lot, Tamar, and others, to obtain children in a surreptitious, illegal manner, or, like Ruth, pursued her husband's kinsman, Boaz, in order to raise up seed unto the former, by stealing into the threshing-floor in the night-time and urging him in his stupid or merry drunkenness to spread his skirt over her. These Bible narratives have misled man in regard to woman and disgraced her in his eyes, he having accepted them as a sample of the sex for all coming time. Woman must undeceive man in this respect by casting these Bible stories from her and him as representatives of her sex. Woman alone can reform man. She must refuse him her aid and coöperation in wrong doing. Were all women perfect models of their sex man could find no Eve, no Delilah, to tempt him or yield to him, no daughter or daughter-in-law to seduce him, and he would be compelled from sheer necessity to remain a male virgin till married, and thereafter a faithful, devoted husband.

These misrepresentations of our sex, O woman, will never be corrected until we ourselves take the case in hand in dead earnest by discarding a book which teaches the opposite sex such falsities and follies about ourselves and leads us into such fatal errors in regard to our own powers, privileges, rights, responsibilities, and duties.

This injustice of the Bible to woman is in keeping with the age and development when it was written. "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife" is in the category with "thou shalt not covet his ox or his ass" or any other piece of property he owned. She was classed with "the house, the man-servant, maid-servant," or slaves, and with the cattle. But this piece of merchandise, the wife, was not commanded not to covet her neighbor's husband "nor anything that is thy neighbor's," as was her husband, simply because she was a thing, goods and chattels. The commandments were not given her. She was not a portion of "the people" that assembled when Moses went up into the mount and received them from God, and yet she is held amenable to them as though she were included and a responsible human being like man, endowed with reason and male attributes.

Neither was she forbidden to eat of the fruit of the tree, according to the record, for Adam received the command and its conditions before she was made. Think of the opprobrium heaped on her as the direct cause of all the evil in the world through her excessive sensualism by "our first mother," partaking of the forbidden fruit, her seducing the virgin Adam from continency, the consequent curse in child-bearing, and her subjection to man, and then ask yourselves if the Bible and the present theology do not justify him in the right of excuse and with authority to attribute to woman passions stronger than his own and lead him to curse her as the author of all his misery, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," giving him the right to place her in an inferior position to himself, chargeable with all existing evils, even death itself! "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," is considered by him a just condemnation for her disobedience, her subordination to him thus secured by the command of God perfectly legitimate, and his authority over her a duty which he must faithfully perform. No woman, believing in the inspiration of the Bible and taking it as her rule of faith and practice, has any right to resist her husband in any law he may attempt to enforce, for from Genesis to the end of Revelation she is taught to obey him in all things, and that as Christ is the head of the church, so is he her head; even when fallen prostrate at her feet, lying in unconscious, maudlin drunkenness, to herself, her children, and the world she must acknowledge him as her superior, her lord and master, her divine "head," so ordained by God.

What a "head" for a noble, intellectual, pure woman! Yet this is the Bible, and a Bible prohibiting divorce for any vice or crime except adultery! Then away with it! Away with its false teachings, fables, pagan mythology, and abuse of woman, and assist her to free herself from these shackles and to overcome these vile aspersions descending down from the dark ages and settling like a pall over her existence and the existence of the race!

Woman's position under Judaism and Christianity, as portrayed in the Bible, is unworthy of herself and man to-day. Then why seek to maintain and perpetuate it by retaining such a book as authority? The abominable laws respecting her in the Old Testament and in the New, especially those of Paul in 1 Corinthians and elsewhere, are a disgrace to civilization and English literature; and any family which permits such a volume to lie on their parlor-table ought to be ostracized from all respectable society, unless there under protest. The time will come when King James's Bible (present version) will not be spoken of without a blush of shame tingling the cheek of modesty, or referred to except as a text-book obsolete, superannuated, blasphemous, false, pernicious, corrupt, immodest, obscene, and too immoral to be tolerated, even as a past nuisance, ancient, foreign, and worthless.

Woman, this is your work, to rise in rebellion against the book which promulgates such false and vile opinions in regard to yourselves, which is the origination of such erroneous views relative to your needs, motives, and desires, which, in every relation of life, misrepresents your position, aims, and interests; which clouds your hopes, stifles your ambition, circumscribes your opportunities, chains you down to slavish servitude in obedience to its mandates; gives to man, as man and husband, superior rights and privileges, exonerates him from all blame when most to blame, and installs him, right or wrong, Lord God over one-half of the human universe, and that half his mother, wife, and daughter, making him the fiat to which woman must universally defer, and limiting her education, privileges, possibilities, aspirations, and intuitions to his blind selfishness, controlled by passion, filthy lucre, ignorance, and power.

These pages have not been penned for pastime, but for a purpose, to call woman to her duties, to show her her responsibilities, to expose her dangers, to reveal her errors, to open her eyes to their origination, viz., the volume called the word of God, wherein she is maligned, outraged, victimized, enslaved, chattelized, polygamized, scourged, crushed, brutalized, and even denied the right of immortality, her very name suppressed, or merged within her husband's as unworthy of a place in history, her love trampled under foot, her affections scorned, motives questioned, sincerity doubted, her virginity despoiled, wifehood betrayed, and her very motherhood prostituted.

Yes, we charge all this and a thousand times more upon the Bible and the Bible God or Bible makers; woman being therein reviled and held up as a contemptible thing, fit only to be used by man as a menial, a toy, or a slave, as one of a numerous set of wives or concubines, to be discarded or kept at will or pleasure—even the Bible-God interfering to fill up seraglios, steal wives, prostitute damsels, and violate matrons and mothers.

Let us pause and estimate the value of such a book, its aminus and its results on humanity—such women, or their history, as hav been considered in this review, called godly or holy in this nineteenth century, and set up by Christianity as patterns for maidens, wives, and mothers to follow!

As we have delved into this rottenness, we have shamed our own face and the face of others in the quotations made from the sacred word, yet often omitting language too vulgar for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and have been compelled to ask pardon of the reader for a seeming breach of decency when an omission of some obscene passage would have failed to elucidate our subject or prove a statement. Our apology for this work is the Bible itself, itself so vile in its shamelessness that only itself could expose itself, for like the "Holy Bible Abridged" no language of ours could equal its obscenity or do it justice in portraying its filthiness; therefore, pardon is expected by the author, who took upon herself the unpleasant task and painful duty of probing the offensive ulcer, from whose festering foulness has emanated disease more contagious and fatal to the mental, moral, and physical well-being of the race than from all other sources combined.

This may be considered a wild statement, nevertheless true, though perhaps unprovable. No estimate can be made of the wrong done to woman by the existence and authority of the Bible, and if done to woman then to man and the race; therefore we implore our brother man to assist woman in discarding this filthy book, its pernicious doctrines, and unjust laws against, if not the better half of humanity, at least that half or portion with which he must coöperate in order to perpetuate the race and reproduce himself. If we ever again take our pen to expose the shortcomings of man, we trust this will not be the sin of omission that we must attack, viz., want of interest and lack of support in aiding woman to destroy the authority of a book which has been her greatest foe and most fruitful cause of oppression from man.

Woman, man is in your advance respecting this book, for having preceded you in its attempted destruction, and often has he encountered your fierce indignation when he would have sacrificed this hydra-headed tyrant, your idol which has made you its too willing victim. Assist him in this work of annihilation, oppose him no longer. Realize that morals are not advanced or preserved through Bible teachings, progress secured, or science unfolded. The next great battle of the world is to be fought on the hights of reason between the truths of science and the errors of superstition. On which side, O woman, will you be found in this mighty contest? Aiding and abetting your enemy, the Bible, or arrayed against it rendering assistance to you savior, reason, science, and truth? Oh, choose the latter, and unite with your brother man in exterminating from the earth the greatest scourge of the race, a false and pernicious theology, the doctrines of which are found within and sustained by the Hebrew and Christian scriptures, known as King James's Bible. Farewell for the present.

Minnesota Meanderings.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My last notes of travel left me at Northfield, Minn., the scene of the famous Younger and James boys' last raid. The three Youngers are now expiating in Stillwater penitentiary their "crime against society." Query: Where are Belknap, Harlan, Craig, et al? In the penitentiary? Oh, no, dear, simple readers. They were only "irregular" in their financial transactions.

Mrs. S. J. Lenont, Chas. Holt, H. H. Barber, Mrs. Rice, and Messrs. Iverson, Ruby, Martin, and Fish are activ secularists. If Minnesota had twenty such workers as Mrs. Lenont the state would be heard from in no uncertain way.

Dr. H. L. Armington and lady at Cannon Falls are the forlorn hope of our cause in that priest-ridden neighborhood. They hav suffered much at the hands of the bigots in various ways and naturally hav no great love for the powers that be, either in church or state.

At Farmington I met Dr. Berlin, N. B. Rowley, and Peter Martin, all outspoken Freethinkers. And speaking of Freethinkers reminds me that while at Northfield I one evening attended the free Methodist camp-meeting. The evening air was fairly lurid with the flames of hell, metaphorically speaking. It seemed like the good old times once more to hear those two preachers yell. "I believe that there are men and women in this world who are sure of hell-fire," roared the old man. "There is a line which it is fatal to cross;" "Satan is wonderful cute;" "It is a dreadful thing to grieve the Holy Ghost;" "I tell you when God says lake of fire and brimstone he means it;" "When preachers who pretend to be called of God say there is no hell they deny half of the Bible;" "Young men and women, do what the Bible tells you to do. If the Bible told me to lift the world I would do it, for God would tell me to do nothing which I could not do;" "Ushered into eternity;" "The devil wants to ruin us; God wants to save us;" "Neighbors and children will rise up in the awful judgment day and call you cursed in the name of God;" "Satan wrecks souls in various ways;" "There is an hour coming when they (sinners) will weep and wail with damned spirits and devils;" "The devil has come out to make war on man," etc., etc. These and other choice specimens of Methodist eloquence were fairly yelled out, with appropriate accompanying gestures. This is the most ignorant and consequently sincere and earnest Christian sect of which I hav any knowledge.

Minneapolis is a busy, thriving city. They say that there are many Freethinkers here, but with few exceptions they are of the negativ, "respectable," do-nothing sort. G. Gunneson keeps a supply of Liberal books, and in other ways does all he can to help in the good cause. Messrs. Curtis and Kingsley are also wide-awake secularists. The papers of Minneapolis are notoriously unfair in their treatment of all subjects of a religious nature. The Pioneer Press is a rival of the Chicago Evening Journal in the strife to see which paper of the Northwest can say the meanest things of unpopular reforms and reformers. Said the Pioneer Press concerning Gov. Roberts's refusal to appoint a day of thanksgiving upon the recovery of Mr. Garfield:

> "Gov. Roberts gave a shambling reply, declining on the idiotic plea of unwillingness to confound the functions of church and state. He is probably aware that the President regularly sets apart a day each year for thanksgiving, and that the executivs of the several states adopt the measure by proclamation. To gibber about church and state in our country and upon such an occasion shows up Gov. Roberts in an unenviable light. It means simply the most venomous kind of Bourbon hate, disguised under a pretext so absurd that an ostrich would ashamed to seek its shelter. . . . The good people under his rule might further enliven the proceedings or their holiday by disposing of the governor in effigy."

The malignant meanness of this Republican hireling in trying to make political capital out of the manly action of the Texas governor, for the party of Hayes, Dorsey, Brady, Howgate & Co., is only equaled by his utter ignorance of the principles upon which this government was founded. Now he can only try to incite a mob to burn the recalcitrant governor in effigy; once men of his kidney would hav burned the man himself. What they lack now is the power and courage.

The village of Long Lake lies close to the sheet of water of that name, and just north of the beautiful lake Minnetonka. Heretics are very numerous in this neck'o woods. In Long Lake and vicinity and at Mound City we hav such activ workers as W. Archibald, L. Underhill, the three Lydiard brothers, O. B. Brown, Dr. Shepperd, Messrs. Alderman, Shuck, Barnes, Stubbs, Burrell, Slow, Graves, Wiley, Hawkins, and Walsfeldt. Spoke here twice in Freethinkers' Hall. A great many former Nova Scotians in these parts. Very pious, some of them. Not all, though.

Lake Minnetonka is a fine body of water. It is becoming a fashionable summer resort. Noble steamers ply upon its waters and expensiv hotels dot its shores.

The Freethinkers' badge pin made me a pleasant acquaintance one day upon the Hattie May. Our good old friend, J. Kinser, of Champlin, is not ashamed to show his colors. Why do not more of our people wear this neat little symboical ornament? Are they afraid?

Organized a League at Anoka with such stanch veterans as W. S. King and lady, and J. M. McGlauflin, of Anoka, E. M. Rathbun and John Kinser, of Champlin, and William Kruegar, Christ Schreiber, and John Hechtman, of Osseo, among its charter members. It is the intention of the Anoka friends to soon make a beginning in the direction of a Liberal library. Comrade McGlauflin will furnish a room in his hotel for meetings and for the library, and will act as librarian. Out in Mr. Rathbun's and Schreiber's district it is desired to start a debating school the coming winter, meeting in the schoolhouse. The Christians hold their services in these public buildings, and should they object to their fellow-tax-payers doing likewise, it is likely there will be music in the air.

From Anoka back to Minneapolis, stopping but a short time, and thence south, past old Fort Snelling, founded in 1819, the Falls of Minneapolis, and other points of historical, poetical, and legendary interest, to Northfield, where I canvassed for several days and spoke once.

But I could not then, in fact, as I cannot now, in retrospection linger longer in the lake-dotted state. I must away to Iowa, where duties connected with the coming state convention at Cedar Rapids call me.

At Nora Springs I found the ever-gentlemanly agent of the B. C. R. & N. R., Israel Turner, and Miss Cavanagh, telegraph operator for the same company, still earnest in the cause of mental emancipation. Messrs. Holcomb, Manchester, Snow, and Birney are each at work in the seeding field of humanity.

At Greene I found Johnnie Wilson, J. D. Steves, and A. Wilson ready for a League, and steps toward the organization of the Butler County Liberal League were at once taken. From the hospitable farmhouse of A. Wilson we drove over to Bristow through a fine farming country, and found George M. Slight and W. S. Welsher ready for work. Near Clarksville D. Wait was found willing to enroll himself for justice. Stopping at Clarksville briefly, I next proceeded to Shell Rock, where reside those Messrs. Cunningham, Goodsell (Sr. and Jr.), Dees, Leverich, Jenks, and Mrs. Fisher. To friend Jenks I am under special obligations for kindnesses received.

Next to Waverly, and from thence to the Spiritualist camp-meeting at Jefferson. Owing to lack of conveyance we did not reach the scene of illumination until Sunday. The meeting was under the direction of Dr. J. C. Cory, of Waterloo, and the chief speakers were himself and Elder Warren. The attendance was quite large and very harmonious in its determination to work for the rights of man, irrespectiv of creed. A business meeting of the Liberal League of northern Iowa was held Sunday afternoon. Officers for the coming year and delegates to the Chicago Congress were elected. That "noblest Roman of them all," M. Farrington, was reëlected President. Cedar Falls is supposed to be under the complete control of the church, but I readily found enough secularists to organize a strong county league. Mr. W. St. John and lady, O. Othey, H. W. Conrad, L. W. Maxwell and lady, Paul Geering, D. W. Bridgeman, J. Pfeiffer, and J. W. Alexander are especially outspoken and activ.

Going west from Cedar Falls over the Illinois Central, I next stopped at New Hartford, where I made the acquaintance of M. J. Pierce and lady and R. D. Strickland, the only live Freethinker in the place. At Parkersburg could find nothing but "phenomena" hunters, a Spiritualism more worthless than Christianity for all practical work. Ackley, on the contrary, has some Spiritualists who believe in working for humanity here and now, prominent among whom is Dr. H. K. Morris. Laura N. Walker had been visiting in Cherokee county, and with the bairnes joined me here. From Ackly back to New Hartford and Sunday well spent in the hospitable and Liberal home of the Pierces; then back to Cedar Falls, a hasty transfer there at 12:50 A. M. Monday on to the B. C. R. and N., and away we go to Cedar Rapids. A good road-bed, excellent rolling-stock, courteous officials and employees and fast time make this one of the most popular lines in the state. Cedar Rapids is reached at 3:16 A. M., and soon the bustle of a busy day begins.

Hart & Wetzel's Hall is secured for the Convention. Numerous friends and some not so friendly are interviewed. Notices given to the Standard and other arrangements connected with the Convention are perfected, then aboard train No. 5 of the C. N. N., and in a few minutes I step off at Norway. Mother fondly welcomes her wandering boy, and my summer trip of 132 days is ended—a summer of hard work, small pay, many frowns, but some warm smiles, cordial hand-clasps, and earnest good speed. To sum up all in a few words, our cause is progressing; the most opposition we hav to encounter comes from our own ranks, born of selfishness, apathy, indifference, narrowness, and blind hero worship, What we need to do is to push the circulation of our papers, organize, and educate the young.

E. C. WALKER, Sec. I. L. L.

A SINGULAR quarrel concerning a burial has just taken place in France. A young soldier, named Henri Boulanger, the son of a widow living at Auxerre, lately died in Algeria, and was brought back to his nativ city to be buried. His mother wished him to be interred with religious rites; but the deceased youth had given himself out as a Freethinker, and he had left a will by which he appointed as his executor one M. Gallot, a Freethinking printer and activ Radical in Auxerre. Boulanger's will contained no directions about his funeral; but M. Gallot contended that, as executor, he was entitled to arrange the obsequies as he pleased. Accordingly, he issued a number of handbills convoking the townspeople to a civil burial; and Boulanger's body was carried to its grave with a demonstration of red flags and Masonic emblems. Mme. Boulanger thereupon applied to the authorities for leave to hav the body of her son exhumed and buried in a Christian manner. Such an application had never been made before, and it excited a good deal of interest. The Procureur de la Republique argued that as the deceased had expressed no wishes about his interment, it rested with his family and not with his executor to determin how he should be buried; and the court, adopting these conclusions, empowered Mme. Boulanger to hav her son exhumed and laid with religious rites in the family vault. Immediate execution of the judgment was ordered; but the defendant has given notice of appeal, for the point of law raised is a novel one.—St. James's Gazette.

LONG, long ago Pascal said to the Jesuits, "The world is getting mistrustful, and no longer believes things unless they are evident to it;" and this is daily growing to be more and more a fact. People do not swallow all manner of miracles as they once did. All gods are but a gradual development; from worshiping many material, visible objects men passed on to adoring the sum and substance of all things in the one great source of light, heat, and life—the sun; and from this sun-worship grew and developed a worship of the great invisible spirit, as they termed it; and this is now being resolved into nothingness by scientific scrutiny and research, and ere long we shall see the great masses of the civilized races settling down upon the hard-pan of fact and reality.—Elmina D. Slenker.

ain many thousands of years ago, long enough not only to be teachers of Pythagoras, but the ancient Brahmans of Hindostan and the Magii of Persia as well, there are the strongest proofs. There are two ways in which information is gained of the inhabitants which once peopled Wales and the whole of the Island of Britain—cave explorations, and the examination of tumuli or graves. The caves, before such things as human dwellings were constructed, were the retreat of the people who were once the inhabitants of what is now England and Wales. They were driven there by the severity of the weather and to escape from their enemies, whether human or fierce four-footed animals. A rampart of loose stones was thrown up to protect the entrance. In later times, even after dwellings were constructed, caves were still resorted to in cases of unusual dangers. In many caves of Wales and England the bones of human beings have been found side by side with the bones of the cave-bear, the mammoth, the woolly elephant, the hippopotamus, the rhinoceros, the hyena, the tiger, and the lion, which animals only live in hot countries. That the British Isles were once a very warm country cannot be doubted. The bones of these long defunct animals prove it, and the extensive coal fields prove it, for the coal plants of which the coal deposit were composed could only grow in regions very humid and warm. Yes, England and Wales, though north of fifty degrees, had once the climate of the torrid zone. The animals of the torrid zone flourished here, and the vegetation which could only exist in a torrid climate grew here to an enormous degree. But this must have been long, long ago—probably a hundred thousand years ago. The poles of the earth, the equator, and the precessions of the equinoxes do change, but it is so slowly that thousands of years pass by with very little difference in climate perceived. There is little doubt that where the north pole is was once under the equator. The existence of the remains of the coal plants in the polar regions conclusively proves that these latitudes, now considered the regions of eternal frost, were once torrid, with the sun vertically overhead, but this was long, long ago, how many hundred thousand years ago I cannot tell. I have seen an estimate of how many hundred thousand years it requires for a place under the equator to come to be the pole, but with the failing of memory I will not now undertake to state it, but it must be hundreds of thousands of years.

At all events, the bones of human beings have been found in many caves in England and Wales side by side with the bones of animals which have not been known to exist for thousands of years, and of those which can only exist in very warm countries. This island could not have been such a country within a shorter period than ten, twenty, or fifty thousand years. This one fact alone completely disposes of the Bible story of the time when the world was created, and proves in the most positive manner that England and Wales existed thousands of years before the Bible says the world was spoken into existence. These facts knock into oblivion what is called the Mosaic account of the creation upon which Judaism and Christianity rest. The foundation of these religions is thus proved to be utterly false; and if the foundation is false, what about it can be true?

Since the period of the earth's existence, when the humidity and heat were so great that the coal plant grew so luxuriantly and in such immense quantities, the glacial or frozen period supervened. Vast bodies of ice covered thousands of square miles where the coal plants had previously flourished. Stones weighing tons have been slowly moved for miles by these slowly-traveling bodies of ice, and the furrows which their sharp edges have made in the earth and rocks over which they passed are plainly to be seen, not only on the British Isles, but on many parts of the earth's surface. Rocks of immense weight have in this way been transported many miles, and were deposited upon the melting of the ice far from their original resting-place, and from where rocks of the same formation are to be found. These things are true, but the Bible gives no account of such changes on the earth's surface, though the Bible was written thousands of years subsequent to the events thus hinted at. In matters of truth, as in matters of science, the Bible is thus proved to be utterly at fault, and is worth little more than the nursery tales of "Old Mother Hubbard" and "Jack and his Bean-Stalk."

What did the writers of the Bible know about the existence of the coal plants and the deposits of the carboniferous strata over millions of square miles of the earth's surface? What did they know of the changes of the equator, the poles, and the precessions of the equinoxes? What did they know about the glacial period? What did they know about the earth having poles, an equator, about its being a sphere, revolving daily upon its axis, and annually making a journey round the sun? What did they know about the nature of the earth's existence or how long it had been in existence? Nothing whatever. They were complete ignoramuses on all these subjects, and knew no more about the creation of the world and the facts of its motions and changes than little children just large enough to run about the door-yard. Still we are told we must believe everything they wrote to be infallible, and that if we do not do so we will have to burn in hell forever. All this talk is equally as false as were the Bible writers themselves, and it is now too late in the day of science and truth for sensible people to longer swallow such idle tales and such equally idle and false threats if we do not believe them.

The changes that have taken place on the earth's surface have been slow and gradual. The earth does not change suddenly in its orbit, many thousands of years being required for a place where the torrid zone exists to be changed to the north temperate zone, or for the glacial period to supersede the highly heated condition of the earth. Tens of thousands of years, and perhaps hundreds of thousands of years, must have rolled by while all these changes were taking place, the greater share of them probably before man appeared upon the earth. The changes that have taken place since man existed have, too, been great indeed. Portions of the earth have changed their altitude, some places rising and others sinking, some sea-coast washing away for miles in width, and other places equally building up. Geologists tell us that the topography of England and Wales has changed wonderfully, and this since man has existed. There was a time when miles in width on the western coasts of Wales and England were mainland which are now covered by the Atlantic. There was a time when the Bristol Channel had no existence, when the Orkney Islands, and the other islands of England, Scotland, and Wales, belonged to the main land; and it is even claimed that once the British Channel did not exist, and that England and France were joined together. The same chalk formations exist on the northern coast of France and on the southern coast of England. That solid ground once connected them is not improbable, though the channel is now in places a hundred miles in width.

Cardigan Bay in southwestern Wales has furnished a text for geologists and chroniclers. An old Welsh triad records the destruction of sixteen towns in a lovely country by the sea. Far out in the sea are the remains of stone embankments. Holyhead, now separated from Anglesea, is believed to have been connected with it since human settlements there. Giraldus wrote six hundred years ago about forests out at sea. Raised beaches to the southward, it is claimed, date from Flemish days. Forests sank near Tenby so long ago as the people used stone implements. Similar changes are to be seen at Manorbier. Sunken forests are also known at Kidwelly. Heather roots are dredged up near Caldy Island. All around Pembrokeshire, at very low tides, ancient land is seen, yielding the remains of oak, fir, elk, red-deer, and the graves of men; similar disclosures being found on the opposite coast of Cornwall, goes far toward proving that what are now the two coasts were once united, and that the Bristol Channel, as now observed, did not exist.

James Bonovich, F. R. G. S., says: "The Welsh caves, in which there is evidence of human beings dwelling with animals, now extinct in Great Britain, bear a similar testimony as to changes of level. Geologists say that after the glacial period Wales was submerged at least thirteen hundred feet, and that it was after the rise that the second glacial age took place. The Welsh caves trace tenants of an order bespeaking not only a continuity of land, but a difference of climate in that part of Britain, when man had to contend with elephants, mammoths, hyenas, and hippopotami."

Flint weapons and tools are said to be the earliest memorials of man's existence. These are found on each continent and in every principal country. Even Egypt, which can boast of a civilization six thousand years old, has furnished chips of rude flints narrating the story of its savage days. Wales has a plenty of the same handiwork to exhibit in proof of its primitiv races. They are in the form of stone hammers, pounders, diggers, grinders, cutters, borers, whetstones, rubbers, spindle-whorls, flasks, daggers, axes, cups, disks, celts, etc. These are usually of flint, but in places where no flint existed other stones were used. Hugh Miller said, "Man in the savage state is the same animal everywhere." Dr. Barnard Davis, in speaking of the stone age, says: "The stone instrument was made everywhere by the same number of strokes, and given exactly in the same direction. There must, therefore, have been the same wants, the same powers and capacities, the same skill, and exactly the same taste or the same desire for the beautiful, with exactly the same mode of gratifying it."

Hammer stones, plain and perforated, it is asserted, were found in the mines of Cardigan, in Pembrokeshire, Anglesea, Holyhead, Corwen of Merioneth, Caerdeb, in hut circles of Holyhead, Old Geir, etc., all in Wales. Flint chisels and gouges, called celts, were found at Neath, Dwygyfylchi, Llangyllog, Old Gier, Llansilin, and other places. Some worked stones, like dumbbells, are thought to have been used as sinkers for nets. Grinding stones were found near Aber, of Carnarvon. A perforated stone axe, eight inches in length, was found in Llanbrynmair. Spindle-wheels were found at Ty Mawr. Flint flakes, undoubtedly used as knives and scrapers, have been numerously found in many places. Evans, in his "Flint Implements," mentions these having been found in a dozen places in Wales. Some were well trimmed, others were left more rough, and are supposed to have been used as arrow-heads. These, even, were found in Anglisea, where no flint is within many miles. These flint implements and weapons, as in many other countries, bear evidence of two ages—the older stone age and the newer stone age. As the races developed, and made slight advances toward civilization, they bestowed more care upon their stone implements and exhibited upon them a greater degree of mechanical skill. In the later age they were often carefully polished. The older are styled Palæolethic, or early, the later, Neolithic, or new. The latter are found in caves and graves with crude specimens of pottery, but no pottery has been found with the older stone implements, another proof that the stone age is properly divided into two periods, the old and new.

It has been said that explorers have been materially aided in determining the order of deposits on cave floors by the formation of stalagmites. Water saturated with lime trickled through the fissures of rocks forming the roof and left a slowly increasing deposit of stalagmite on its stone floor, while the stalactites remain suspended to the roof above. When bones or tools were left on the floor of caves they were slowly covered and imprisoned with these limy formations. Thus the lower bed of stalagmites clearly contain older deposits or older implements than those of the upper layers. In this way the same cave may give a reliable succession of the remains of an extinct race.

For the valuable accounts of Welsh cave-explorations the world is greatly indebted to such men as Profs. Boyd, Dawkins, Huxley, Hughes, Busk, Flower, etc. The caves explored by them notably are at Towyn of Cabel, Yale of Denbigh, Perthichwaren, Cepe, and Plus Heaton of St. Asaph, Penally of Pembroke, Caldy Isle, Ogle of Tenby, Paviland, and Oxwich of Glamorgan. In some of these were found very primitive looking flints, the bones of the extinct ox, the goat, the hog, the rhinoceros, cave-bear, hippopotamus, the extinct elephant, and all these in company with human bones and the handiwork of men's hands.

Gower is rich in the caves bearing proof of the long past ages. Benson says, "All the known bone-caves of Gower and the Mumbles appear to be about the same hight above the sea and to have been raised at the same time;" while it is said the woods beneath Swansea Bay exhibit the action attending a subsidence of the coast. In Bucon Holes the bones of the rhinoceros, bear, and mammoth found a final resting-place in company with the bones of the human beings who once lived with them. Bonwick says: "Paviland cave had flints, charcoal, the tusks of the mammoth, and a skeleton with ivory ornaments. Oxwich Bay cave, twelve miles from Swansea, contained the elephant and the rhinoceros. Long Hole turned up many flints with extinct mammals." As it must have been many ages ago when these extinct and tropic animals existed there, some appreciation may be had of the length of time human beings have lived in this country.

Tenby Museum contains many of the ancient Welsh remains here alluded to, and caves in its immediate neighborhood are said to be well worth visiting. They can only be approached at low water, but are full of interest. The Black Rock, Hoyle, Longbury, and Ogle caves are particularly recommended. The men and animals which occupied them lived when Bristol Channel was a plain and Caldy Island a hill upon it. Hoyle's Cave exhibits these materials in three successive diggings: breccia and stalagmite, red cave earth, black earth, worked flints, pottery fragments, ashes, bones of men and extinct animals. In the Black Rock Cave the reindeer, woolly rhinoceros, and auroch, or European bison, were found; while the Fairy Chamber of Caldy Island contained the woolly rhinoceros, elk, mammoth, lion, bear, hyena, cave-tiger, hippopotamus, reindeer, auroch, cave-wolf, and a wild horse, with disproportionately large head. It is thought many mammoth calves were dragged in by hyenas. In a cave in Denbighshire was displayed a refuse heap belonging to historic ages; but below that a remarkable collection of human and animal bones belonging to a prehistoric age.

It is not my purpose here to show that the early inhabitants of Wales and England were the original Druids who emigrated to Asia, but merely that this island of Great Britain was peopled many, many thousands of years ago, when it was a tropic country, and that it is possible that some of its inhabitants might have journeyed to the East and carried their religious notions with them.

OWING to a detention in the mails of Mr. Bennett's round-the-world letter this issue is one day late. We waited, knowing that the readers would regret the absence of a letter from Mr. Bennett more than one day's delay.

Letters from Friends.

LIBERAL, Mo., Sept. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: It has been some time since you heard from me, so I thought I would write you of our progress. After a pretty strong move by the Christians around us we hav settled down in a peaceful manner to commence life in the only exclusivly Liberal town in America. We built a nice hall, and hav dedicated it to universal mental liberty, as may be seen upon its front in fac simile of the Freethinkers' badge-pin. We had a pretty severe wind that came when the hall was in an unprotected condition and partly took it off the foundation; but we hav replaced it and partly finished it. We hav many new-comers (Liberals) from abroad, and they all express themselvs as pleased with our prospects, and most of them either settle here or invest money in some manner.

We are now investigating the co-operativ business, and I expect it will culminate in a co-operation in manufacturing interests, and perhaps mercantil also.

We are now working up the school business, and hope soon to hav not only unsectarian public schools, but higher schools and institutions that may be a credit to the Liberals. We find the Liberals all over the country interested in the idea of a Liberal colony; and in reply to various letters to the Liberal press I hav got a large number of letters of inquiry. We can now say to the Liberals of the United States, The town Liberal is a success, and those who investigate will find it so. We hav a good place to locate either a woolen mill or a flour mill. We are laboring to build up before the eyes of the world a higher society than orthodoxy can furnish, and hav a town that is free from churches and saloons; and by the use of books, papers, the stage, good speakers, and mental freedom we hope to bring to mankind our highest ideal conception of the social relation.

FRANK M. BAKER.

TORONTO, ONT., CAN., Sept. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav much pleasure in sending you the names of three new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, with accompanying cash. I think we should double the circulation of the paper before Mr. Bennett's return. Nothing could be finer as an inducement to get subscribers than his letters from abroad, and to those who desire to canvass, and so forward the good work, this is their golden opportunity.

I hav noticed that some hav expressed themselvs adverse to Mr. Bennett's going, fearing the paper might suffer in consequence; but they seem to forget the very able and satisfactory manner in which it was conducted during his previous continued absence, and I wish to say I hav every confidence in the management of Mr. Eugene Macdonald.

Yours respectfully, J. F. DANGERFIELD.

PIPE STONE, MINN., Aug. 23, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I see by your last issue that your noble leader has arrived safe in Glasgow. My heart leaps with joy and gladness whenever I hear of any and every success of our noble leader and champion of human rights. May success, health, and happiness attend him on his journey and land him safely back to his loved and loving ones, is our daily prayer. The suggestion of Bro. Stratford is a good one, and hope it will call forth a hearty response.

Yours for truth and right, A. J. BROWN.

WEST BELLEVILLE, ILL., Sept. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3.00. Please forward the books ordered as soon as you can. I hav been taking your paper now for over a year through the newsdealer of this town, but now I wish it direct from the office. It is the best paper of the kind published, and I shall always speak a good word for it wherever on opportunity offers. It ought to be in every home in the land, for then this would soon be a better world. Respectfully, WM. T. BECK.

HEPNER, OREGON, Aug. 29, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Our town has just received a four-days visit from Dr. J. L. York, the great Liberal orator of the Pacific coast. While here the doctor delivered three very interesting, entertaining, and instructiv lectures on the following subjects, viz., "Evolution," "Common Sense," and "Individuality." He handled his subjects ably, and orthodoxy, superstition, and bigotry were beautifully shaken up. So much so, that it is our opinion that many who were undecided in their opinions hav now come over to the Liberal ranks.

The doctor is the first lecturer who has been amongst us on the subjects which he heralds, and we hope it may not be his last.

We understand he has taken five new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER while here. He goes from this place to The Dalles, Portland, Salem, Albany, Eugene City, and other towns in the Willamette valley. We wish him success in the great work he has before him. Yours truly, L. F. SHIPLEY, M.D.

SALT LAKE CITY, Sept. 14. 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I herewith send you a post-office order for $5, and request you to enroll my name as a subscriber to the publication of the round-the-world trip. Wishing every possible success to the enterprise, SAMUEL GEO. READ.

AN OPEN LETTER TO ELMINA.

GOSHEN, N. Y., Sept. 9, 1881.

MRS. SLENKER: I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER your account of the conversion of an enfeebled old man. To me that is not surprising, under circumstances detailed. As an offset I wish to say I hav been a practicing physician for thirteen years, and in all that time I hav been unfortunate enough to lose a number of patients, as, indeed, is the fate of all humanity and doctors as well. I cannot say how many hav died under my charge, but among them hav been children, old men and young, young women—among them a beloved wife. I hav seen them die in full consciousness, and in coma and insensibility to all surroundings, and in all these cases only one expressed a dread of impending dissolution. They, our brothers in humanity, and sisters also, either passed out into the unknown with, (1) utter indifference; (2) cerebral insensibility, coma; or (3) in such a state of overpowering weakness and restlessness that they looked forward to the hope of dreamless sleep, "an eternal rest." Now, dear sister in humanity, I accord with your suggestion that we use increased effort to spread the gospel according to D. M. Bennett, and will say that I hav converted a large family of ten brothers and sisters with one exception, besides the married branches, by circulating Freethought works. DR. A. J. JESSUP.

SEDGWICK, Sept. 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I received your postal card, and I would say that I want you to continue to send THE TRUTH SEEKER. I wish to become a life subscriber, as I am getting quite old, being now 77 years old, and not able to do much hard work, and as your paper employs my time I enjoy it very much. As I am one of the government's poor I do not get any money but once a quarter, and I am often without any. I had three sons in the army, and two of them got killed, and I receive a pension for one of them. I shall not hav any money until about ten days from date, and if you please I should like to hav your paper as long as I liv, and I will send you money as soon as I receive my check,

Respectfully yours, WINSLOW LAWTON.

FOREST GROVE, OR., Sept. 1, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Once again I apply to you for a small amount of mental food in the shape of Liberal books and pamphlets which are to be used for missionary purposes; also send me one of those fine lithographs of the great champion of Freethought, whom we hav sent upon a long and dangerous journey for the purpose of giving us a truthful and authentic description of foreign countries their people and customs. I hope that every Liberal in the land will send and get one of the lithographs of Mr. Bennett. I want one of them to add to the lithographs of Paine and Ingersoll, then I will hav a trinity of the religion of humanity. They are in my judgment a portion of the true saviors of the great human family. Now, I wish to say a few words in regard to the proposed plan of illustrating Mr. Bennett's book of travels. I do not comprehend how Mr. Bennett can go to the great expense of traveling for a year or more, and also the incidental expense of publication, and send post-paid two or perhaps three volumes for the meager sum of $5. Now, I propose to pledge $1 more to help defray the extra expense Mr. Bennett will incur in illustrating the books. If a few hundred more Liberals would giv fifty cents or a dollar it would be a considerable help, and the books would then be cheap. We hav to pay four and five dollars for a single volume of any note on travels in the Holy Land, and of all the books on that subject that it has been my lot to read the authors hav had a Rev. or D.D., affixed to their name, and their heads contained more superstition than judgment, as the candid reader will perceive by the contents, which consist of a large amount of pious cant, perversion of facts and truth, and a superabundance of illustrations of Bible myths, such as Sampson in the great bone feat, Jews crossing the Red Sea upon dry land, Noah's ark, tower of Babel, the birth of the mythical Jesus, his crucifixion, resurrection etc., and other nonsensical and untruthful drawings from imagination, which they would hav us believe are historical and real occurrences, without an iota of evidence to sustrain them, outside of faith, which is the Christian's sole stock in trade. There is one thing that people can rely upon in regard to Mr. Bennett's description of that country, that is, it will be just as it is in reality; his mind is not befogged with the cobwebs of superstition, and let us hope that no Methodist parson has slyly exchanged spectacles with Mr. Bennett. I hav often wished for a description of the Holy Land written by some one free from the influence of priestcraft, so that people could obtain a common sense idea of the land of myths, the land that gave birth to the two worst system of religion that ever blighted the earth—Christianity and Judaism, with their black record. Please find inclosed $1.75, for which please send me the following: One lithograph of Mr. Bennett, for he is one of my deities, and to hav the portrait of his good-natured face upon the walls of my sitting-room will act as a charm to frighten away the Christian's gods, ghosts, etc., if they chance to come prowling around. I also want the pamphlet by Pringle, "Design in Nature," to giv to an orthodox friend whose mind is impregnated with erroneous ideas that the Bible God created the world from nothing (can some friend tell us where he got it)? I also want the pamphlet "Ingersoll in Canada;" I wish to ascertain if our theological friends in Canada are as ignorant of history as Judge Black, or as untruthful and malignant as the clergy of the United States, and lastly I want six copies of "Crimes of Preachers," which I wish to donate to some orthodox friends who exalt the clergy to the skies, and think that they are infallible. I want the aforesaid friends to read a few, or rather, many, facts in regard to the conduct of men who claim to be appointed by their Bible God to break the bread of life, and I want them to see that their God makes mistakes in his appointments as well as in other matters. Yes, one of the greatest fruits of Christianity is crime, as the criminal records of our country show that during the past five years more crime has been committed in the ranks of the 60,000 preachers than has been committed by the millions of Infidels and Liberals during the same length of time. This fact proves that infidelity to Christianity is fidelity to truth and morality. Hoping that we may soon hear from Mr. Bennett, I remain, THE TRUTH SEEKER'S friend,

W. C. CLOW.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 17, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Josh Billings, the funny fool who writes for the New York Weekly and thinks his bad spelling makes him smart, in nearly every issue of that weekly has a fling at the Infidels and Atheists. In one number he says that "Infidelity iz sumthing a man haz got to lern out ov books. He kan't lern it ov hiz mother, nor ov the works ov God."

Well, I will agree with Josh that I did learn mine from books, and my first lessons were from the Bible; and the more I read and studied it, the more confirmed I became in Infidelity. My second lessons were from the book of nature and the works that he would call God's, and I soon found a wide difference between the God of the Bible and the God of nature.

In another number he says: "If I kood hav my way about it there ain't a human being on the face ov the earth but should hav all hiz rezonable wants gratified. The only real mean thing about me iz I hav alwuss bin too poor for my impulses."

Reading in a New York paper a short time ago of the many improvements made at one of our most fashionable watering places, Long Branch, among the names of persons owning fine residences there was Josh Billings. I understand he has also a fine residence on the Hudson river. If he is so anxious that the human race should hav all their reasonable wants gratified, one fine residence might satisfy him, as there are so many in the world that hav not more than one room to liv in. He might sell the Long Branch property and divide it round among his poor relations or friends, if he has any. By so doing he would do some good and prove that he was not a Christian hypocrit. But I rather guess he is like the man who, during the war, was so patriotic (and I am not sure that it was not Josh himself that said it) that he was willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations for the good of his country. Yes, he would even send his mother-in-law and take the risk of her going to nurse the small-pox and yellow-fever patients. Now I think Josh would like to benefit the human family in the same way at the expense of some one else. He made a mistake. The mean thing is, his love of money is greater than his love for humanity.

Here is his last fling: "Infidels are bad citizens. The man who don't believe in future rewards and punishments iz a desperado at hart and iz liable to ' e one in act the fust good chance that offers."

Now all I hav got to say is, that is false—false as hell that he believes in, as I know many Infidels that will not hesitate to compare their record for truth, honesty, and morality with Josh or any other believer in future rewards and punishments. The man that has to be kept honest by that doctrin I would not like to trust if he got a good chance to cheat me without the fear of detection.

Now, Mr. Editor, I don't know anything about the character of Josh, but you newspaper men generally know the writers for the papers. Suppose you let your Infidel readers know something of this man who undertakes to pass judgment on their morality. He and Tony Comstock would make good mates, and I would advise him to pay Tony a visit and look over his collection. Most likely he would enjoy it, as I think one about as big a hypocrit as the other.

S. H. BROWN.

WOODHULL, ILL., Sept. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please correct my error. Nothing givs me more pleasure than to correct my mistakes. L. W. C. says in the last TRUTH SEEKER that the word "hell" is retained in the new translation. Like himself, I had no copy when I wrote, and, from report, really supposed it was left out. I cheerfully stand corrected. But from the fact it is seldom we hear hell-fire and damnation from pulpits or in revivals, and that Thomas of Chicago, Beecher of Brooklyn, and other reverends hav taken out all the fire and brimstone—and a hell without these is not much like the hell we had fifty or one hundred years ago—the word "hell" might as well not exist.

A New Song.

BY M. FARRINGTON.

"I will put a new song in their mouths."—Bible.

AIR: "Bruce's Address."

The world still calls our doctrins vain,
And Infidels our creed arraign
And prove our systems faults contain;
Our Bible they disprove!
We've tortured them with rack and chain;
We've put to death with fire and pain;
And strove our best the race to rein;
And all in Christian love.

At last our church, becoming wise,
A great commission did devise,
King James' Bible to revise,
And cast the bad aside.
They met; and year by year they found
The books with errors great abound,
And proved what skeptics said is sound—
That priests and bigots lied.

Now something quickly must be done,
For church desertion has begun;
The rays of reason's glorious sun
Are shining far and wide.
The sons of reason, undismayed,
Boldly engage the Cross brigade,
With clarion trump and flashing blade,
In conscious strength and pride.

We then another tack must take;
We cannot now burn at the stake;
Men no more fear hell's smoky lake,
Nor all our pious lies.
Revise then! Oh, revise! revise!
We've all our lives been preaching lies,
But cannot forget the good and wise.
Revise! revise! revise!

The Inside History of the Dantzic Conference.

The emperor went to meet the czar,
And both the monarchs had traveled far.
The emperor said, when they met on the sea,
"Come over, my boy, and dine with me."

"All right," said the czar, from behind a gun;
"I will dine with you at half-past one;
But first I must send my police to you,
To search your officers and your crew."

The search was made, and the emperor said:
"Come over, my son, for the cloth is spread."
"I will," said the czar, "if you deem it best,
As soon as I don my bullet-proof vest."

The dinner over, they hastened ashore,
But a bogus czar was sent before;
The real one went in a fisherman's boat,
With rubber boots and a ragged coat.

At Dantzic he shunned the palace halls,
And begged for the shelter of prison walls.
He said there were Nihilists all about,
And nothing but stone could keep them out.

And so the descendant of many czars
Was hidden from view by iron bars;
And Bismarck entered to talk of peace,
Well watched by the Muscovite police.

The Romanoff's conversation ran
On poisons and things that kill a man;
And the only subject that pleased him quite
Was—the last new thing in dynamite.

When Bismarck spoke of political work,
Of fiery Frenchman and turbaned Turk,
He said he was ready to giv his note
To Krupp for an iron-clad overcoat.

The emperor said: "He is always so,
And we can do nothing but let him go,
And send him safely on board his yacht.
If he is happy, why, we are not."

A Warning.

(From Heine, by George Gossman, M.A.)

What avail your prints aggressiv
Worthy friend you are a goner;
He who wishes fame and favor
Must resolve to be submissiv.

'Twill not do to be so gritty
When you're speaking to the people,
Or to write of priests and preachers
Without asking the committee.

What avails your sense of honor,
When the power's in the dollar;
In the tongues of priests and preachers,
Worthy friend, you are a goner!

REPROOF.

Man, don't make sport of the devil!
For the course of life is brief;
And the talk of future pain,
Is no idle church belief!

Man, do not fail to pay your debts!
For if life be long be sure
That you'll often hav to borrow
As you often did before.

Reflections on the Origin and Philosophy of Evil.

BY L. B. COLE.

Oh sin! thou foul, thou damning deed!
What was thy purpose? what thy need?
In nature's vast creativ plan
Wert thou designed alone for man?
Of all the worlds that float in space,
Is this alone by sin disgraced;
Was man made perfect (if at all),
On all but this terrestrial ball?
In all the vast creation round
That varied beauties there abound.
Why could not man these gifts enjoy
Without the curse of sin's alloy,
To blast his hopes, to curse the hour
That made him subject to its power?
Did God or man procure thy end?
Art thou a demon or a friend?
If God designed mankind to bless,
Of wisdom's plans he'd choose the best,
And choosing with a sovereign will
His every purpose would fulfil.
If this involved a low beginning,
The greater is the joy of winning;
And greater still as man shall rise
To broader views and brighter skies.
Shall man both ignorant and blind,
Presume to scan with finite mind,
The wisdom of the great first cause,
The grand arcanum of his laws?
As well with microscopic eye
Might insects scan the distant sky,
Or trace the comet's trackless way
Through boundless space from day to day.
This fruitless task let sophists try,
'Tis wisdom's part to pass it by;
But with such reason as we can,
Let's justify God's ways to man.
Let not blind ignorance demean
What nature hides in beauty's sheen,
But rather let us seek the cause,
If such there is in nature's laws.
Let's find the reason if we can,
Why sin's entailed on mortal man.
Was it from choice and with intent?
Was it for good or evil sent?
If sent for evil as an end,
Why curse old Nick (a needed friend),
Whose cunning saw his sovereign plan
To make a world for sinful man?
To curse with unrelenting ire
In endless flames of liquid fire.
And if for good he deemed it best
That man with knowledge should be blest,
Then Satan served his purpose well
To cause the woman to rebel;
To bring her to the tree of knowledge,
A Neophyte in nature's college.
How else could she know good from evil,
Or choose to serve a God or devil?
'Tis needful that men wiser grow
In plodding through this world of woe.
If progress is a law of nature,
Then knowledge comes to every creature
In lessons new from day to day,
To help when passion leads astray.
If such was the design, 'tis plain
That man a novice must remain
Till knowledge tell him how to choose,
What to accept and what refuse.
And that he might progress in knowledge,
The world was made for him a college,
All past experience for a teacher,
The only true and faithful preacher,
That he might call from wisdom's store
Both old and new forever more,
The lessons by past ages taught,
By pain and suffering were bought.
Sublimest joys are won by trial,
They come through toil and self-denial.
If ignorance was the cause of evil,
What use was there for friend or devil?
In spite of what the preachers say,
Old Nick (the elf) must pass away,
And with his weird and mystic crown,
His sulphurous kingdom must go down.
When Satan's dead and hell's no more,
How priests and bigots will deplore
The loss of all their stock in trade,
By which their proselytes are made!
When wisdom reigns all fears will end,
And knowledge, man's redeeming friend,
Will point him to angelic skies
Where all in due degree shall rise.
The brightest seraphs in the skies
Hav tasted sorrows, bitter tears,
And rose from passion's dire control
Through fire's trial to their goal.
The true philosopher will find
That all things serve the end designed.
In realms of nature and of art
The whole depends on every part;
All causes balance in a scale
So nicely that no part can fail.
So sure as water drives the mill
All causes will their missions fill,
And in concatenation make
An endless chain without a break.
The power that shapes the tiger's claw
Makes all things subject to its law.
The flowers of most resplendent hue
Contain their hidden poisons too.
'Mid roseate hues and amber skies
Wild storms and tempests take their rise.
In every good that heaven bestows
A thorn is nestled with the rose.
And yet in nature's wide domain
There's nothing sought or made in vain.
The good or ill, or fire or frost—
Each is for use, and nothing lost.
The seeming ill our heart decries
Is wisdom's lesson in disguise,
To cleanse the soul from love of sin
And sanctify the life within—
To train the wayward soul to climb
And spread its wings for hights sublime.
Thus good and ill their lessons giv,
To teach the living how to liv.
And each some quickening power imparts
To strengthen weak and wavering hearts.
As law to order ever tends
So good with ill forever blends,
To modify the creator's plan,
And bring the greatest good to man.
The largess that our hand bestows
In time may blossom as the rose,
And bear its fruits in friendlier climes,
Where heart to heart in virtuous chimes,
Where love and truth hav full control,
And friendship flows from soul to soul.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, hi system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

Gems of Thought.

THE Norsemen understood in their hearts that it was indespensable to be brave, that Odin would hav no favor for them, but despise and thrust them out if they were not brave. Consider, too, if there s not something in this! It is an everlasting duty, valid in our day as in that, the duty of being brave. Valor is still valor. The first duty of a man is still that of subduing fear. We must get rid of fear; we cannot act at all till then. A man's acts are slavish, not true but specious; his very thoughts are false; he thinks, too, as a slave and coward till he hav got fear under his feet.—Carlyle's Hero Worship.

BOOKS are not absolutely dead things, but contain a progeny of life in them to be as activ as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve, as in a vial, the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. . . He that destroys a good book kills reason itself; kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man livs a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life.—Milton's Arcopagitica.

MY days among the dead are passed;
Around me I behold,
Where'er these casual eyes are cast,
The mighty minds of old;
My never-failing friends are they
With whom I converse day by day.

With them I take delight in weal,
And seek relief in woe;
And while I understand and feel
How much to them I owe,
My cheeks hav often been bedewed
With tears of thoughtful gratitude.
—Southey's Library.

THE celebration of Sunday was always, like that of every festival, a human institution; far was it from the apostles to treat it as a divine command; far from them and from the first apostolic church to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday.—Neander.

THERE may be a God external to the universe, but that there is such a God is no logical inference from the universe. When I say there may be this external God, I of course mean no more than that I can show we know nothing to the contrary. To my mind there is a shocking irreverence in the common babbling on this theme. And what is all the talk about trinity and unity and personality of God but babbling? What is all ecclesiastical tradition on the subject but raving, and as Coleridge said about Calvinism, superfetation of blasphemy?—N. R. Waters.

THE harsh things said about nature are true things; the whole fabric of nature is built upon a principle of death. The destruction of one creature is the salvation of another; the death of one is the life of another; the anguish of one is the pleasure of another; the torture of one is the amusement of the other. See the panther drop on the antelope; it is natural for him to do so. See the cat play with the injured mouse; it is natural for her to do so. See the vultures peck at the eyes of the dying buffalo; it is natural for them to do so. Science reveals these facts, with many another, all bearing the same signet. She points out how the earthquake spares not for the shrieks of the terrified people; how the waves smooth not at the cries of the drowning crew; how the fire leaps none the less high for the fierce moan of the burning man. But science does not make the facts which she reveals. Science is not responsible for the revelation she unfolds.—Annie Besant's Christianity and Freethought.

THE breakers were right beneath her bows,
She drifted a dreary wreck,
And a whooping billow swept the crew
Like icicles from her deck.

The rattling shrouds, all sheathed in ice,
With the masts went by the board;
Like a vessel of glass she stove and sank,
Ho! ho! the breakers roared.
—Longfellow's Wreck of the Hesperus.

WHAT a melancholy notion is that which has to represent all men in all countries and times except our own, as having spent their life in blind condemnable error, mere lost pagans, Scandinavians, Mohammedans, only that we might hav the true ultimate knowledge! All generations of men were lost and wrong, only that this present little section of a generation might be saved and right. They all marched forward there, all generations since the beginning of the world, like the Russian soldiers into the ditch of Schneidnitz Fort, only to fill up the ditch with their dead bodies, that we might march over and take the place! It is an incredible hypothesis.—Carlyle.

MY life is cold and dark and dreary;
It rains and the wind is never weary;
My thoughts still cling to the moldering past,
And the hopes of youth fall thick in the blast,
And the days are dark and dreary.

Be still, sad heart! and cease repining;
Behind the clouds is the sun still shining;
Thy fate is the common fate of all,
Into each life some rain must fall,
Some days must be dark and dreary.
—Longfellow.

SO MANY complain that we are only able to teach the scientist and the scholar our doctrin, while the ignorant and unlearned go right on believing in myths and fables. But if we gain the great class of real thinkers the day is then ours. The goal will surely be won. The preacher carries his church along, the teacher carries his school along, the parent carries his children along, and this will bring the truth and the light into every home, and we shall win all the illiterate through the influence of the learned whom we first convert to the newer and better doctrin.—Elmina D. Slenker.

LUTHERAN, popish, Calvinistic, all these creeds and doctrins three Extant are; but still the doubt is, where Christianity may be. —Longfellow.

Odds and Ends.

"PARTING is such sweet sorrow," remarked a bald old bachelor to a pretty girl as he told her good-night. "I should smile," she replied, glancing upon his hairlessness and wondering how he ever did it.

TOURIST: "Where is Rock Island?" Polite American: "In Rhode Island." T.: "But how can you put one island in another island?" P. A.: "Oh, that's nothing—we accomplish anything in this country."

A GOOD churchman was commenting at the breakfast table on the conduct of one of the vestry, when he was suddenly interrupted by his hopeful aged seven, exclaiming: "Papa, why don't you pull down your vestrymen?"

A PRETTY young girl full of pique,
Got down in the mouth, so to spique,
And when people laughed
She thought she was chaughed,
And she stayed in the house for a wique.

DEATH'S test is a favorit theme with Christians. The Duke of Buckingham on his death-bed was asked to send for a priest, but refused. Sect after sect was named till the Catholic's were mentioned, "No, no," he said, "they eat their God, find me a fellow who eats the devil, and send him here."

AN UNEXPECTED RISE.

I stood on the porch at evening,
When the sun went silently down,
And the June bug bright, in the starry night,
Flew merrily through the town.

Oh, sweet were the gentle zephyrs
That blew from the balmy south,
And red were the lips and sweet the sips
That I took from the pretty mouth.

Her tiny waist was encircled
By my arm so strong and true,
Said I, "Whose ducky are you, love?"
"Yours," she murmured, "and whose are you?"

Oh, the hallowed hours of that evening!
Oh, the cruel caprice of fate!
Her father, unkind, came up from behind,
And fired me over the gate.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK abides in this city,
Where they let him run loose. It's a confounded pity!

Anthony meddles in people's affairs,
Anthony peddles in scandalous wares.

Anthony found out a straightforward man,
Anthony thought out an infamous plan.

One Wilson had proven the friend of the lame,
To reach his spondulics was Anthony's game.

Inventor and monger of articles patent,
Electrical healing in his wares was latent.

That people were cured was very well known
From ills they'd endured, as their letters hav shown.

But Anthony's plan was to write to the people,
To ask if this man hadn't cheated a little.

Now the people receiving his circular letter
Twigged Tony's deceiving, and went him one better.

They went and told Wilson, who straightway proceeded
To treat Mr. C. in a way he's long needed.

And if the machinery of justice don't fail
Mr. Comstock's career will be ended in jail.

MULE OF TEXAS.

Mule of Texas, ere we part,
Tell me why you will not start;
Or, if really you must balk,
Pray excuse my wicked talk;
Hear my vow before I go,
I'll be even with you, though.

By your long tail unconfined,
Wooed by every passing wind;
By those heels, so wondrous swift,
Which can men o'er tree-tops lift;
By those ears that droop so low,
I'll be even with you, though.

By those ribs I long to baste,
By your show of d. b. taste,
By the melancholy bray
That alarms folks miles away;
By your stern resolve to whoa,
I'll be even with you, though.

Mule of Texas, I am gone;
Think of me, sweet, when alone,
For I fly to get a club;
Then your blamed old back I'll drub.
If I cannot make you go,
I'll be even with you though.

STUDIES IN SPELLING.

There is a small village called Ainwicke,
Whose inhabitants fell in a palnwicke
When the comet they saw;
And they all holiered, "Oh, law!
It is certainly something Satalnwicke!"

There was an old man of Alife,
Who kept getting dife and dife;
When yelled at, he'd say,
In a wondering way,
"Oh, what do you whisper to mife?"

There once lived not far from St. Denis,
A slangy young woman called Jenis,
Who, when asked by her beau
A-riding to geau,
Said, "Thank you, I'm not taking enis!"

There was a young man of St. Cyr,
Who impatiently muttered, "Oh, dyr!
I certainly fyr
I hav drank too much byr,
For my head feels uncommonly quyr.

In Southern conventions the negro
He cuts quite a prominent fegro;
But in all restaurants,
When the waiter he wants,
They draw pistols and pull on the tregro.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 41. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, October 8, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. George F. Meredith, who has figured in Illinois as the "boy preacher," has been arraigned by his Methodist Conference on charges of falsehood, drunkenness, and profanity.

A JUDGE at Erie, Pa., has just decided that Spiritualism is a religion, and its exponents are entitled to all the privileges enjoyed by ministers. A medium who had been arrested for giving exhibitions without a license was accordingly discharged.

THE Rev. Dr. Boyd, of St. Louis, is accused of plagiarism from Edward Everett; but the Globe Democrat says it is rather a "case of morbidly retentiv memory reacting upon unusual receptivity of mind, and producing unconscious assimilation of ideas." That lets the minister down easy.

A CALCULATING friend who seldom employs any other interpreter to the Bible than the "rule of three," being asked his opinion of the deluge, replied in a manner worthy of Jeremy Bentham, "I think it a great waste of water, which might hav been more profitably and humanely employed in quenching hell-fire."

A BITTER quarrel in the Roman Catholic church of the Holy Trinity, Chicago, is followed by a graver accusation than is usually made in such affairs—that of murder. Pastor Mielcuszny was found dead in his room, and Assistant Pastor Malek is under arrest on a seemingly unjust suspicion of having killed him.

PROF TYNDALL has now a chance to test his prayer-gage practically at a merely nominal expense. The Rev. Mr. Marshall, a colored divine of Clark county, Tenn., announces his readiness to pray for anything or anybody for the ridiculously trifling sum of seventy-five cents a prayer. No doubt wholesale orders would be filled at a suitable reduction.

AN original method of measuring "original sin" was found out the other day by the young son of a clergyman, who had been studying the steam-engin during the invervals of the cathechism. "Papa," said he, "as we all inherit the sin of Adam, and the baby is such a little fellow, is there not a greater pressure of sin to the square inch in him than in the rest of us?"

A CHIEF of the Piute tribe of Indians, who roam over Nevada, was asked what he thought of the comets. The chief wrapped his robe closely around his body, stood erect, and, pointing upward, declared that the sun is the chief of the heavens, the moon is the sun's squaw, and the stars are his children. The great sun must eat, and, therefore, whenever he feels hungry he catches one of his children and swallows it. The moon is very proud of her children, yet is doomed every month to see one of them devoured by their unnatural father. She then goes into mourning so deep that she even paints her face black. Fortunately, however, the paint gradually wears off and she shines forth as bright as ever until her next loss.

A MAN named Edward Spencer, described as a "Captain" in the salvation army, was committed for trial on a charge of having robbed his employer, a grocer. This scoundrel had induced a young girl, a member of his congregation, to come and liv with him. A letter in which he had described this as "the Lord's wish" was read out in court. No wonder that the magistrate denounced him as a "dissolute, impious, hypocritical scoundrel," It is such characters as this who bring the religion of the gospel into disrepute, and cause people to ask themselvs, "Is there any such thing as true religion whatever?" "Oh, where shall wisdom be found, and where is the place of understanding?" We can affirm at any rate that it is not to be found in the Salvation Army.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, has arrived in London. He will visit many places in England before the International Freethought Congress, after which he will continue his trip round the world. Mr. Bennett's expenses are paid by his friends and admirers, who consider themselvs compensated by his letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER from abroad.—London Republican.

A CORRESPONDENT writes from Keene, Mich, that a young lady of that town received ten dollars from her father as a reward for climbing a church steeple and cheering for Colonel Ingersoll, instead of twenty, as given in THE TRUTH SEEKER. The young lady, Miss Juliett Bowen, wishes him to state, however, that she regrets it was not twenty. The father is still offering five dollars apiece for the next ten ladies who will follow the example of his daughter.

THE late Roman Catholic bishop of Newfoundland was a merry prelate and one who loved a joke. He had a piano which he desired to dispose of and which a friend, a Protestant doctor, desired to purchase. Considerable chaffering ensued, which ended in the doctor buying the piano at a price which the bishop declared ruinously low. The only vehicle which would accommodate the piano was the hearse, and in this it was accordingly driven to the doctor's door. Down came the doctor to the bishop in high dudgeon. "What the—I mean why on earth did you send the piano home in the hearse? it looked very ridiculous." The good bishop's eyes twinkled merrily as he remembered the terms on which the instrument was sold, and he answered, "Why! because, my dear doctor, it was a dead bargain."

IN his recent proclamation, President Arthur says, "Whereas, in his inscrutable wisdom, it has pleased God to remove from us the illustrious head of the nation, James A. Garfield, late President of the United States." This is, in fact, placing upon Providence the responsibility of the act committed by Guiteau. If Providence did it, as President Arthur alleges, why blame the mere instrument used in that damnable taking-off? If it be true that Providence compassed the death of President Garfield, Guiteau is an innocent man, because he was made use of by omnipotent power to accomplish an act devised by "inscrutable wisdom." The fact of the matter is, President Arthur has been made to express himself in the cant of the day. If the shooting and consequent death of President Garfield was the result of providential interference, is that same power at work when other people are shot and die, or is it confined to presidents and crowned heads generally? In ordinary cases, if one man shoots at and kills another, the man who fires the shot is called a criminal. He is put in irons, tried, sentenced, hanged, and men rejoice that murder has been avenged. No one rises to say that the killing, or, as President Arthur has it, the removal, was an act of Providence or an illustration of "inscrutable wisdom." On the contrary, they express horror and detestation at the act. One is accustomed to the conventional terms incident to platform oratory; but when a grave public document is issued it should be at least consistent with known facts. The surgeons who attended President Garfield hav said that death was inevitable as the result of the wounds he had received. If they are to be believed, a certain physical phenomenon, death, followed as the natural, the inevitable, result of a certain physical cause—the injuries inflicted by the bullet. If the proclamation had said that President Garfield had fallen by the hands of an assassin, at the commencement of a career full of hope and promis, it would hav stated the fact as it was; but to attribute his premature death to a direct act of Providence is to travel into the depths of the unknown, and to excuse Guiteau besides.—London, Ont., Free Press.

ACCUSATIONS of witchcraft and maltreatment of supposed witches by the illiterate country people are still things of frequent occurrence in Germany. A recent number of the Danziger Zeitung tells us of an incident of this kind in the village of Stangenwalde, where an old lone woman was accused of having bewitched an invalid widow, because as the latter was driving by the other's hut her horse suddenly came to a stop. This was assumed to be owing to the old woman's occult influence, and to prove that the widow's influence had been caused by her. The old creature, frightened out of her senses, was dragged to the widow's bedside and subjected to various torments to coerce her into expelling the devil from her victim. This mode of procedure failing, she was compelled to inflict cuts in three of her fingers and permit the widow to suck her blood, after which the invalid immediately began to feel better. It was then proposed to hang the witch, and a rope was fastened round her neck, while the crowd beat her about the head and face with slippers and shoemakers' lasts. She was finally rescued, but in a dangerously injured condition.

D. M. BENNETT, the brilliant editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, is now making a tour around the world. THE TRUTH SEEKER will contain each week during the time of his extensiv journey a letter from him relating to many of the every-day scenes of his travels. Mr. Bennett, as many of our readers will remember, was a few years ago arrested at the instigation of one Anthony Comstock, a hired and infamous imp of the church, tried and convicted, and sentenced to the state prison in the state of New York, for the crime of sending, as a stupid and biased court decided, obscene literature through the mails. President Hayes, although importuned by hundreds of thousands of petitioners for the pardon of Mr. Bennett, proved to be too cowardly to grant his release, and so he was compelled to serve out the full term of his imprisonment. Mr. Bennett, although made to occupy once a felon's cell and to wear a felon's stripes, instead of being disgraced stands to-dav as one of the most honored citizens of our republic, while Rutherford B. Hayes has sunk into obscurity and Anthony Comstock is being now allowed to receive only the reward of a perjurer and a villian. D. M. Bennett has been placed by the verdict of millions upon one of the highest pinnacles of human fame.—Iconoclast.

WE sit and sigh and long for him and he comes not with the bread of life. We mourn and grieve for him, and yet he comes not with the bubbling yeast of salvation. We are in sackcloth and ashes for him, and still he comes not with the waters of life to irrigate our thirsting soul. Come, bishop; come, thou sweet and ancient cherub of sanctified piety, and convert the loyal and royal Jews in the office of the Jewish Times. Your circulars giv the world to understand that you are on a collection tour to gather in, reap, and harvest coin, bright and shining coin, for the "conversion of the Jews." Let us hav a little of the root of all evil in this office, bishop, that the root of all good, your salvation salve, may be unctious and fruitful unto our spirit. Seriously, Bishop Wingfield, of Benicia, state of California, do you think you could occupy your time to more advantage and with greater profit to "your Lord and master" by attending to the fallen lambs in your own fold and let the wandering sheep in the fields of Israel take care of themselvs? They hav been in the habit of doing so for the last five or six thousand years, and it looks a little superfluous on your part to act as their shepherd, and that without invitation. But why do you beg for coin to convert the Jews? Why not turn our water into wine and feed thousands on a few loaves and fishes as your master did? Ah! you hav lost the "spirit" but not the thirst for coin, bishop, and that is where you and your master differ. Bishop Wingfield, speaking to you with profound respect, we hope to meet you in heaven—if you ever get there.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XXV.

All the horrible and agreeable that man's life may contain was crowded for me into the narrow space of a few hours of this day.

A folding-door was opened. Some ladies stepped forth toward me. The eldest of them addressed me, "I am very grateful to my nephew that he procures for me the honor to receive the generous rescuer of innocence in my house."

Who can comprehend my surprise! It was Madame de Sonnes, and Clementine stepped from behind her mother. I wanted to stammer a reply to the courtesies bestowed upon me, but I was too feeble. The loss of blood in the morning, after a sad, wakeful night, and the change of the most violent and strange emotions and sensations, whose prey I had been so far, had completely exhausted me. Clementine's appearance unnerved me. I saw only her, speechless, her, until forms and colors before my breaking eye floated in confused darkness together.

For several weeks I was confined to bed and room. With the pains of my wound a fever had united. The young Mr. de Sonnes never left me; he had brought my scanty property over from Bertollon's house, also the harp, but the wreath was missing. Ah, it was not known what value it had for me.

Meanwhile Madame Bertollon had been discharged. Mr. de Sonnes told me that the beautiful unfortunate one had immediately departed from Montpellier and had entered a distant convent. At that he handed me a letter that had arrived for me in care of Madame de Sonnes.

"Probably Madame Bertollon will thank her rescuer," said he.

I took the letter, with trembling hand. As soon as I was alone I read it. It since then has accompanied me through all my weal and woe.

Here it is:

"ABBEY ST. G——, AT B——, May 11, 1702.

"Farewell, Alamontada. These lines, the first that I write to a man, will also be the last. I hav left the stormy life of the great world. The sacred stillness of consecrated walls surrounds me. I hav, without difficulty, been able to separate myself from all that was once dear and indispensable to me. I hav taken with me out of the world nothing but the wounds it inflicted upon me.

"Alas, that I might hav been able to hav left also these wounds and my memory outside! But they remain with me in order to make the last of my friends, death, the more charming.

"In the bloom of my life I must wear the black veil of widowhood. I exhibit therewith to mankind one mourning which I do not feel, and conceal another which destroys me.

"Yea, Alamontada, I do not blush, even now, even on this sacred spot, to confess what I did not want to hide from you—that I loved you. You knew it; you know it. Alas, and it was you who could thrust the dagger into a heart that beat for you alone on this earth. O man, you hav belied me! You hav never loved me! It has not grieved me that my unfortunate husband has wanted to blame me with the blackest crime; no; that Alamontada could believe me guilty, could become my accuser, he for whom joyfully I could hav died, that has torn the roots of my life.

"But no; no reproach. Noble, dear, and still loved man, thou wast innocent. Blinded by appearances, thou madest of thy feelings a sacrifice upon the altar of friendship and justice. Thou wouldst, at the highest, be only miserable, but not ungrateful. I knew it well the wife of another had no right to love thee, and I, with my sinful love, was never worthy of thy pure heart.

"I felt it always, and always I went with too feeble powers into the battle against my passion. There was no being more miserable than I, and each of thy looks, each of thy kisses, perpetuated a fire within me which ought to hav been quenched by them. In a moment of silent despair I preferred voluntary death to the danger of losing my virtue. Then it was I had the poison procured. I had destined it for myself, for I loved thee too violently. Here, man, thou hast the secret which shame would hav prevented me to confess, even under the torture. Ah, misery-bringer! And thou it must be who, before the judges, questioned me about it.

"Thou hast never loved me. My disappearance will never grieve thee. I had deceived myself, and must suffer for the devotion of my innocent heart. The world pities me, but this pity leaves me comfortless; and even thy sympathy, O friend, can only make my pain more acute instead of soothing it.

"Here, in these convent walls, I see the goal of my short pilgrimage. The linden-tree before the barred window of my cell spreads its shade over the little space which shall be my grave. Behold my consolation!

"Ah, how sad it is to be so lonely in this world! And lonely I am, for no one loves me. I am already forgotten in the merry circles of my friends; my tears do not disturb their pleasures. I fade, like the solitary flower in the mountains, unseen and unknown; it gave and received no joy, and its disappearance leaves no trace behind.

"And thou, whom alone I hav loved, call these lines our farewell letter. A breaking heart breathed the words; a dying hand wrote them. I only fulfilled my last duty. Do not interrupt my peace through an answer. I accept no letter, and will never see thyself again. I will pray to God for thy happiness, will dedicate my last sigh to thee, and, with the thought of thee, death shall lead me into the better life.

"AMELIA BERTOLLON."

And I never beheld the noble one again. She perished with her virtues in her heart. I never forgot her. Often I wept at her memory.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Meanwhile Madame de Sonnes and Clementine had often visited me during my sickness. I was not treated by them like a stranger, but like a relativ, like a brother.

Madame de Sonnes was a noble lady, of lively spirit and fine education. She did not seem to liv for herself, but for others. Always anxious to render services to or prepare pleasure for others, she knew how to giv to those who did not object to be made happy by her the appearance of being her benefactors. Her goodness bore everywhere only the stamp of gratitude.

And wholly alike to her was Clementine, the pride of her sex. The harmlessness of innocence, together with an always cheerful disposition, made up her character. No one could approach her without loving her. So beautiful I had never seen her, never fancied her. Her smile was inspiring, her look spoke only to the soul; the grace of her action was ideal. From all her friends she was distinguished by so much loveliness that she alone always was admired. And of all she was the humblest, she knew nothing of her own excellences, and became enraptured when she observed them in others. One might hav believed she had never seen herself in a mirror.

Since I was in the house she played the harp no more; also was she more bashful than formerly in the distance; she also came to see me more rarely than all others in the house; she also spoke less to me than to others, and yet she was the most eager of all to care for me; yet it was she who most zealously watched for my slightest wishes, and her eyes beamed friendship for me.

While thus my love grew into unconquerable passion the thousand obstacles also grew continually clearer which robbed me of all hope ever to become happy through her. I was poor, and had nothing for myself but a good reputation and the confidence of all honest people. How little is that in the great world! I had, it is true, in the Bertollon suit gained such a general reputation that the number of my clients grew daily; yet how long would I hav to work before I could gain a fortune large enough to dare to approach Clementine?

And daily I saw the angelic being, in her room, in her garden, sometimes alone, sometimes in company. Ah! she could know how much I loved her. My silence and my speech, my going and my coming, were so many betrayers of my heart.

I became daily more oppressed, more unquiet. Nothing remained for me but separation from her, in order not to become unspeakably miserable. I resolved at once to execute my plan, rented a house, and made known my intention to Mr. de Sonnes.

He and his aunt resisted in vain; I remained firm against their wishes and entreaties. Only Clementine did not appear, and begged not, but she grew more serious, and, as I believed I observed, sadder.

"You are very cruel," said Madame de Sonnes to me one day. "What wrong hav we done you, that you want to punish us so hard? You take the peace of our formerly so happy house with you. We all love you. Do not leave us, I conjure you."

All reasons which I might invent to quiet Madame de Sonnes were got sufficient. The only and most important one I dared not reveal. She saw in my resistance only an untamable stubbornness.

"Very well," said she, finally, "we shall hav to resign ourselvs to your will. We are to you more indifferent than I thought. Why is it not given to all mankind to let friendship strike its roots no deeper in the heart than it is necessary, to tear it out again at any moment, without pain? Clementine on that account will be very unhappy. The fear that she may fall sick makes me tremble."

These words were hard blows for me. I turned pale and trembled. "Clementine!" stammered I; "Fall sick?"

"Come with me into my room!" said Madame de Sonnes, without fancying what passed within me.

We went. She opened the door and said to her daughter: "He will not. Do thou persuade him!" I remained alone, and approached Clementine.

Oh, what a picture of beautiful melancholy! Never will it become extinct in my memory. The terrors of an endless misery, which surrounded me in distant quarters of the globe, could not rob it of its life or charm. There she sat, in her simple house-dress, charming as a child from Eden, a withering blossom of blue elder hanging over her hair between the folds of her veil, which enwrapped it, as if she were the symbol of that which she seemed to need most—sleep, rest.

And when I now approached her, she looked up, and her friendly eyes smiled at me through tears. I took her hand, knelt down before her, and sighed, "Clementine!"

She was silent and smiled no more.

"Do you also demand that I should stay? Only command, I will gladly obey, even should I become still more miserable."

"Still more miserable?" she replied, and looked at me questioningly. "Are you then unhappy with us?"

"That you know not! You want to spread only happiness about you. But, Clementine, you make me accustomed too early to heaven. If I now, sooner or later, must lose your intercourse—should lose you, Clementine, and there must come such a time—how would it fare then with me?" said I, while I drew her hand to my violently-beating heart.

"Do never separate yourself from us, then we shall never lose each other!" she answered.

"Would to God that I need not separate myself from you except in death!" I cried.

She looked to heaven, sighed, bent herself over me, and from her cheek fell a hot tear-drop upon my hand.

"Do you doubt the lastingness of my friendship?" said she.

"Hav I a right to your friendship, Clementine? And this beautiful heart, ah! will it not hav to beat some day for another louder than for me? And then, Clementine, then?"

"Never, Alamontada!" she answered, and quickly arose and turned herself away with a countenance glowing with a soft blush. I arose. A nameless rapture intoxicated me. I drew her in my arms. Her bosom heaved under the storm of violent emotions. Her cheeks glowed. Her look told me the word which her lips dared not pronounce.

Our souls blended themselvs and completed the inseparable union. A trembling sigh was our oath. The world vanished about us like a shadow. In the kiss we exchanged life for life.

Oh, what bliss has the hand of the infinit ruler of the universe granted even to the dust, and thereby sweetened the lot of the spirit to be wedded to the earthly!

And when we awakened from our sacred ecstasy, and I could pronounce Clementine's name, and she whispered mine to me, nature around about us was changed, and all no more the former world. Holier and more beautiful was everything about us; the quiet room resembled a temple, and an angelic spirit spoke from everything, from the pictures down to the carpet. And the rustling of the twigs of the trees in the garden was full of meaning, and in the floating shadow of the leaves dwelt a hidden, lovely signification.

"I love!" exclaimed I.

"And eternally!" she added.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER V.

WHAT THE JEWS HAV OBTAINED FROM OTHER NATIONS.

Some one has said that insignificant and enslaved people secretly imitate their masters; that a feeble and uncultivated nation adapts itself in a rough way to the manners of a great nation. It is Cornonailles which is the imitation of London and not London which is an imitation of Cornonailles. Nothing is more natural than that the Jews adopted what they could of the culture, the laws and customs, of their neighbors?

We are quite certain that their God, which we call Jehovah, and which they called Jaho,* was the ineffable name of the God of the Phœnicians and Egyptians. This was a fact well known to the ancients. Clement of Alexandria, in the first book of his "Stromates," says that those who entered in the temples of Egypt were obliged to carry a special talisman composed of the word Jaho, and when any one pronounced that word in a certain way, he who heard it fell dead or disappeared. At least this was what the charlatans of the temples endeavored to teach to the superstitious.

Every one well knows that the figure of the serpent, the cherubims, the ceremony of the red cow, the bathings called baptism, the robes of linen reserved for the priests, the fasting, the abstention from pork and other meats, circumcision, the scapegoat, were all imitations of Egyptian customs.

The Jews agree that they had no temple earlier than five hundred years after Moses; this is according to their ever erroneous chronology. They finally invaded a little town in which they built a temple in imitation of greater peoples. What did they hav before? A box. That was the fashion of the nomadic tribes and of the poor Canaanites in the interior. There is an ancient tradition among the Jews that when they were nomadic, that is to say, when they were wandering in the deserts of Arabia Petra, they carried a box in which was placed a coarse image of a god named Remphan, or a kind of star cut from wood.† We can find traces of culture in some of the prophets, and especially in the pretended discourse which is, according to the Acts of the Apostles, uttered by Etienne.

* More accurately "Yahweh."

† "Hav ye offered me sacrifices during the forty years in the desert? Hav you taken the tabernacle of Moloch and of your god Remphan?" (Acts vii, 43; Amos v, 26; Jer. xlix). Here are singular contradictions. Add to this the history of the idol of Micah, worshiped by the whole tribe of Dan and waited upon by a young son of Moses himself, as our readers can see by turning to Judges xvii and xviii. It is for this mass of contradictory absurdities that my lord of Canterbury gets twelve thousand guineas income, and a kingdom is given to a priest who pretends to be the successor of Caipahas, and who has, without any ceremony, taken the place of emperor at Rome [1776]."

According to the Jews themselvs, the Phœnicians (who were called Philistines) had the temple of Dagon before the Jewish crowd had even so much as a house. If this is so, if all their culture in the desert consisted of a box made in honor of the god Remphan, who was no other than a star worshiped by the Arabs, it is clear that the Jews had nothing that was not originated by a band of Arab vagabonds; that they throve upon brigandage in Palestine; that they made a religion after their fashion, and composed a history full of fables. They took a part of the ancient fable of Back or Bacchus to create their Moses. Those fables are revered by us, since we hav made them the foundation of our religion. These fables are even credited in this age of philosophy. This is, above all, unworthy of wise men. The Christian church chants the prayers of the Jews and burns whosoever is Jewish. What pity! What contradiction and what horror!

CHAPTER VI.

CONCERNING GENESIS.

All the nations by whom the Jews were surrounded had a Genesis, a theogony, and a cosmogony a long time before the Jews existed. It is not evident, then, that the Genesis of the ancient Jews was taken from the old fables of their neighbors?

Jaho, the ancient god of the Phœnicians, disentangled Chaos, or Khautereb; he arranged Muth, or matter; he made man by his breath and called him Calph; he placed him in a garden Aden or Edem, he protected the man against the great serpent Ophion, as is related in an old fragment of Pherecides. What similarity to the Jewish Genesis! Is it not natural that this petty people should, in the course of time, borrow the fables of the great nation, the Phœnicians?

There is a report in Asia that God formed the world in six stages called by the Chaldeans, who were prior to the Jews, the six Gahambârs.

This was also an idea of the ancient Indians. The Jews who wrote Genesis were no better than imitators. They mingled their absurdities with these fables so that I am forced to acknowledge that I could not restrain myself from laughing were I to see a serpent talking familiarly with Eve. God talking to a serpent! God promenading each day at twelve o'clock in the Garden of Eden! God making a pair of breeches for Adam and a wrapper for his wife Eve! All the rest appears just as absurd. Many Jews themselvs blush at it. They consider such tales the product of the imagination, or allegorical fables. How can we, then, accept to the very letter that which the Jews hav regarded as stories?

There is neither in the history of Judges, or the Kings, or the history of any other prophet, cited a single passage of Genesis.* Nothing has been said of that rib of Adam, stolen from his side to be manufactured into a woman; nothing has been mentioned of the knowledge of good and evil, of the serpent who seduced Eve, and, finally, nothing has been said of the imaginary tales of original sin. Must we still believe all?

Their rhapsodies demonstrate that they (the Jews) hav stolen their ideas from the Phœnicians, Chaldeans, and the Egyptians, just as they stole their goods wherever they were able. The name of Israel itself they took from the Chaldeans, as Philo declares in the first page of his account of his deputation to Caligula.† We of the West would be very foolish to think that all which the barbarians of the East had stolen was their own!

*Thomas Paine obtained many of his ideas from Voltaire. He makes this same comment upon Genesis, and adds that "no mention is made throughout the Bible of any of the extraordinary things related in Genesis. It was not written till after the other books were written, and was put as a preface to the Bible. Every one knows that a preface to a book, though it stands first, is the last written." [Note by translator.]

†Here are the words of Philo: "The Chaldeans name the Just, Israel, or "seeing God." [1771.]

J. H. Burnham in Kalamazoo County.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: J. H. Burnham, our state Liberal lecturer, gave us a series of three lectures on Saturday evening and Sunday, Sept. 24th and 25th. These lectures were able, and were well attended. Mrs. E. A. Finlay gave a reading before each lecture, for which she receives the thanks of the society. After the lecture Sunday it was thought best to organize a Liberal club, and the meeting at once elected W. V. Warmington, President; F. B. Hall, Secretary; Lowell Hulett, Treasurer; and Mrs. C. M. Piper, Mrs. R. D. Gregory, and E. W. Hewett, directors. On a call for members twenty-four names were subscribed at once. On the whole, our meetings were a success, and the result shows what can be done in almost any town. People are beginning to think aright, the only trouble being that men and women will not be true to themselvs. Truly yours, F. B. HALL.

Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: It will generally be admitted that the books lying before us, taken from the recent additions to our Club library,* have a deep and important meaning in their titles, as well as their contents. They are, indeed, signal proofs that

"The thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

But they are far more than that—they imply a definite object. For the first time in human history, they bring the light of science to bear upon all of the questions of human life and fate; and by virtue of their truth they demand to be taken as the new gospels, in the conduct of our lives and of all human affairs. They claim to be the test of truth and the guide of life.

For about a hundred years, certainly ever since the French Revolution, these social and religious claims of science have been emerging in various forms, and with ever-increasing volume, unity, and strength. The miseries of mankind have meanwhile continued to add constant emphasis to these claims, and still furnish excuse enough for any attempt, however rash or humble, to appreciate these new gospels or to apply them. In this view the first suggestion that arises is that in order to appreciate and apply the proposed solutions and remedies, we must first get hold of the real origin and nature of the difficulty which science has caused and which therefore it ought to meet and remove. Let us, then, begin with that.

A glance at the map and history of civilization shows that it is now chiefly limited to the Christian and Mohammedan peoples and that their fundamental belief about the world and man is a theology originating chiefly from the traditions of Hebrew history, with subsequent, and consequent, additions of a Christian Savior and a Moslem Prophet, each with a gospel.

The religion, politics, social life, and morality of civilized mankind have, to a great extent, grown out of this theology, or have become associated with it as their supposed support and sanction. Now the difficulty is that science proves that this original belief is one of the childish traditions of our race, imaginary and unverifiable; or, where it can be tested by facts, actually false. Science thus discredits the support and sanction of that which is deemed the most sacred and stable guarantee of human society. Hence the "Conflict between Religion and Science," and the "Warfare of Science," so clearly presented by Prof. Draper and President White, in their works bearing those titles, with which you are familiar. Those works prove conclusively that the attempts of theology to repress science by persecution and proscription have been failures, and will always be; although such efforts are far from being obsolete. They show how useless it is to try to keep men ignorant, or to endeavor to make them believe a lie in order to be good; that thereby there can only grow up a race of imbeciles, hypocrites, or bigots, instead of free, hearty, healthy men and women; that the light and air of free inquiry is necessary to all strong and healthy growth.

But to those who honestly fear that free scientific inquiry and criticism will undermine religion, society, and morality, the other books before us present a view that ought to be the purest consolation. For they show that science in laying aside every form of theology has done so only to become itself more thoroughly and truly religious and reconstructive. The apparent Destroyer now steps forward as the Preserver—as the main support, indeed, of those precious interests which theology is ceasing to control. This is the meaning and the ultimate object of this literature before us. Every estimate of the progress of science is unfair and misleading which does not keep in view this constructive or affirmative, as well as its destructive or negative, influence. Indeed they should both be studied as correlatives of each other. The destruction or disintegration should be regarded simply as the inevitable consequence of a higher and truer construction or integration, which it is our duty to grasp and appreciate. From this, the true point of view, the unscientific character of those who complain of science as destructive may be seen at once. They see nothing but the old passing away. They see not that the old can never die except because of a new birth. In that birth lies the true consolation. To that we must learn to trust.

The poet Goethe saw this when he said:

Schedliche Wahrheit, ich ziehe sie vor dem nuetzlichen Irrthum.
Wahrheit heilet den Schmerz, den sie vielleicht uns erregt.

Painful Truth! Yet I prefer her to pleasant Error.
For Truth heals the pain she may perhaps inflict.

This is the only true, safe, and healthy view. How well science acts as the physician of her own wounds we shall readily see in the very first step toward the solution of the difficulty above stated. For its first thought of a remedy is contained in the discovery of the true origin and history of the human race, which establishes the ascent, instead of the descent, of man, his evolution instead of his degeneration. To that step, therefore, we must first ask your attention.

The Political Aspect.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav always admired the bold and grand strokes made by yourself and through the pages of your noble paper for liberty and justice. Last year when you opened, as it were, the political campaign with your opinion, I was pleased, not at your personal position, but the breadth of the battle-field.

Now I wish to speak in regard to the communications of R. H. Lamb and Moses Hull. My main desire in this article is to say, with Mr. Hull, that Greenbackism is not dead, and also to say that he has answered Mr. Lamb well.

"The Greenbackers hav nothing to complain of!" The outrages committed through the various changes in the currency are enough to make one's blood run cold when they are seen by the bright light of truth. The trade dollar alone ought to make every thoughtful man a Greenbacker. It is not a legal tender for anything, and small currency for only $5, such as pennies (two kinds), two-cent pieces, three-cent pieces (two kinds), five-cent pieces (two kinds), ten-cent pieces (one dime), twenty-cent pieces, twenty-five-cent pieces, fifty-cent pieces. National bank notes from two thousand national banks of issue; that is, with their stamp upon them, all printed for them by the general government at Washington; all based on debt—the national debt. Glorious idea, but the beauty of them is that they are not a legal tender; but most of the people think they are all greenbacks, and now that for the present all paper money is at par, or nearly so. Shall we keep quiet? No. By all that is great and good, let us work calmly until we hav a currency which cannot be changed; not hav and use as money notes for nine-tenths of our business, to be redeemed by the other one-tenth any time, when a few can control that one-tenth, silver dollars (dollar of our daddies) and gold dollars, which the people do not care for as long as they can be fooled with trade dollars, national bank notes, etc.

No, the people must, sooner or later, fix the matter of money representation of value and hav but one kind, and that a legal tender, as far as the bounds of our nation. Again, let the citizen keep his eye open and not be fooled by the present mixed money system.

With respect to Mr. Lamb, when he says the democracy died with a broken heart, I think it not wise to look at a party as dead that has probably cast more votes in this country for the last eight years than any other. Well, not much of a ghost—not even the Holy Ghost. And the Republican party, he says, has outgrown its breeches, its great end and aim being to retain its present power. Now, with its present condition, it may get new clothes, etc., and retain power for a long time. It certainly will when there are many such men as Mr. Lamb, who do not vote at all.

Now the Greenback party take up most of the questions that the Liberals would desire; and if Liberals are ready to take hold of the questions of currency, land taxation, labor, etc., and all things which pertain to this life (not the sweet by and by), le t them look into the principles of th e new National Greenback-Labor party. Of course, some Greenbackers are pious, but they can be made to leave that at home. But a party founded on justice will not interfere with their religion, which should be merely a personal matter. I, for one, am a Greenbacker, and I know many who carry all the principles of the Liberals, and we shall not keep silent in regard to them. The present revolution is of a triple nature—political, religious, and social. But Mr. Lamb must not stay away from the ballot-box. Let him make a ticket that will be a protest, at least. But I hav extended this letter much farther than I intended to at first. Yours for liberty and justice,

C. A. MARSHALL.

What Good?

We hav received the following letter, with the request to publish:

MR. EDITOR: Being a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I feel at liberty to ask the friends of Liberalism a few questions. Granting that the Christian religion has caused much woe, crime, and bloodshed, is it not possible, nevertheless, that the Bible may be an inspired work? Although those people of olden times may hav been sincere Christians, yet as they were ignorant, they were in consequence of their ignorance disposed to be cruel and vicious. Because they quarreled and killed each other on account of their religious differences and persecutions is no evidence against the Bible. It goes only to show that the people were wonderfully ignorant of its real teachings. The religious people of to-day certainly teach sound morality, and if all would abide by their instructions there would be no wrongs committed. Here in our country, where the people enjoy a fair education and hence a fair knowledge of God's moral laws, we find a people who are just and prosperous. I cannot see what we mean to gain by our trying to take away the religion of Christ, when, instead of doing harm, it does some good. The "bugaboo" of the devil and his kingdom of fire and brimstone, I think, scares a great many folks into the path of right, and so why not suffer them to continue in this belief, when without it they may commit all sorts of crimes? I remember, when a boy, how my good parents used to tell me to be a good boy or the "bad man" with big fiery horns would catch me, which indeed had a good effect on my conduct. Now, though there really had no such thing existed, yet my believing so often deterred me from doing mischief. And they tell me to go where Col. R. G. Ingersoll lectures and see who it is that applauds his impious talk. The applause comes up, they say, from all the most worthless and hardest cases of the city. A man from our place once heard the Colonel speak, and says it's a fact; of course he admitted that he did not know anything of the character of those in attendance, but he judged by their actions.

But there is another reason why religion should be sustained, and that is this: It affords an excellent consolation for those who are lingering at the portals of death. It seems painful to believe that at the moment of dissolution we should be entirely annihilated. We desire to make the last hours of our departing friends as pleasant as possible, but not believing in any hereafter, what can we say to cheer them? How pleasant, on the other hand, to say to the dying that Christ is waiting with outstretched arms to embrace him and carry him up into a glorious heaven. Here there is surely hope and comfort while one livs. The Christian religion is a source of the greatest consolation to the dying and their friends. These are my reasons why it appears more profitable to cultivate a belief in the Christian doctrin. If any one can point out my errors, I will be greatly obliged. I and my friend, Prof. Daniel Hochstetler, are the only outspoken Liberals in this section of the country. We are of the opinion that to be religious is to be superstitious, yet I cannot see what we hav really gained by emerging from the ocean of religious superstition.

Wishing our hero, Mr. Bennett, good health, a pleasant and profitable circumnavigation of our planet, I remain, Yours fraternally, SAMUEL BIXLER.

As our friend would like to hav "the argument answered," as he says in a private note, we will just say a few things which come to mind.

The fact that the Bible has been the inspiration of bloodshed and crime would not effect its being an inspired book but for one or two things. First, who is there to inspire it? We know nothing, neither does our friend, of any power outside of man capable of inspiring a book. So far, also, as we know, nobody but men ever wrote books. And until it is proved in the first place that there is somebody besides man to inspire books, and in the second that there is a book in existence which could not hav been written entirely by men, intelligent people will doubt divine inspiration. We know nothing of "God" but what we learn from the Bible. That asserts his existence and offers itself as proof. It is as though a man should walk into friend Bixler's office and, producing a book, say, "I made the world; I am the Lord; is my revelation to man." Mr. Bixler would assuredly want more proof before accepting the man's say-so. And Mr. Bixler's incredulity would be still greater if the man should say: "I am everywhere; I fill all space; I am without bounds, yet I am in the form of a man." He would say that it was impossible to be formless and yet hav form; to be at once infinit and finite. And yet the assurance of the man would not be greater than is the impudence of Christians in making such claims for their God. They make a God of chameleon color, changing as the wind, and then claim for him stability of form. They hav drawn a picture of an omniscient God who knew his own mind scarce twenty-four hours in advance; of an omnipotent God who was weaker than his own creations; of an infinit God with the circumscribed form of a man. Such a God is manifestly impossible. He cannot be one person and yet three; he cannot be omniscient and yet limited in his knowledge; he cannot be omnipotent and yet weaker than his own creatures; he cannot be infallible and yet continually repenting of his own works. So the Bible God cannot be at all. Until it is first proved that there is a divine inspirer we cannot see how there can be a divinely inspired book. There is no book now in existence which was not penned by man. An infallible God could not write a fallible book. That the Bible is fallible its own pages prove, and Christians admit, else why these constant revisions? The Bible is full of blunders in every department of science and art. An omniscient God must necessarily know everything. Would he hav written down that which he knew was not so? That would convict himself of falsehood, and he must hav known that for a lying God men could hav no respect. It must be borne in mind that the Jews did not do all the ignorant, cruel, barbarous things recorded in the Bible because they were ignorant of its real teachings, but because they were imperativly commanded by it and God to do them. In killing people for changing their religion and for being witches the Christians of later times were not ignorant of the Bible's real teachings, but were acting in exact accordance with its commands. People in those days seem to hav been naturally cruel, and the Bible helped them wonderfully. In it they could find excuses for any conduct, however outrageous. In the dark ages murders were not committed by ignorance, but by religion. The most learned were the priests, and they were the most cruel. According to the Bible, God himself in his scheme of redemption set an example of infinit cruelty. To sum the Bible up, it is in conflict with science and morality, is barbarous, cruel, and an unfit guide for civilized people. It bears undeniable evidence that it was written not only by ignorant men, but by men who would be regarded at the present day as barbarians. Its inspiration must be given up because there was no God to inspire it, and if there had been he never would hav inspired such a book.

The religious people of the present day teach sound morality only when they get away from the Old Testament and hang on to Jesus's teachings in the New, which are not original with him, but had been current among the philosophers and religious teachers for hundreds of years before his advent. And the basis upon which the New Testament puts morality is not sound. Morality should not be based upon hopes of reward or fear of punishment hereafter. To do right because one expects to get to heaven or escape hell by so doing is not acting from a very high motiv. Indeed, we should call it a very low motiv. "God's moral laws" are very indefinit, except in their badness.

The Old Testament is supposed to be the very embodiment of God's moral laws, but friend Bixler would hardly turn to that expecting to find moral teachings. The command to steal jewelry, rape virgins, etc., is not moral, and when one reads the whole book he will be surprised to see how often the men who were after God's own heart violated what the civilized world now regards as morality. And the men of God to-day are no better. There is no profession which, in proportion to its numbers, turns out so many reprobates as the clerical. There is no class of men in the world so licentious, so hypocritical. Nearly every defaulting bank cashier or trusted clerk is either a deacon or exemplary member of some orthodox church. If the religious people teach morality they certainly do not practice it. Educated people are more moral than religious people, and it is because their education teaches them that honesty and morality for their own sake are the best. In taking away the religion of Christ Liberalism is substituting in its stead the holier purpose of doing right for right's sake, and not for some reward. A child who is taught to be good simply because its parents will reward it with candy or punish it with blows will be apt to turn out a bad man or woman when the reward is no longer before it. Fear never made an honestly righteous man. The fear of hell never restrained a burglar or a murderer. The Christian religion teaches them that they can commit all sorts of crime and escape its eternal penalties if they only repent at the last hour. The bugaboo of the devil never turned a thief from his course, nor ever frightened one murderer from his victim. It is only used to scare little children and superstitious men and women, and we doubt very much if it ever scared one toward the gates of heaven. It has filled their lives with woe and fear, and made them wretched every moment. It is a cruel belief. But whether it ever forced one into the paths of right or not is no matter if the devil does not exist. Morality based upon a belief in falsehood is not sound morality, and if the devil and hell are creatures of priestly fancy then it is a crime for honest men and women to teach a belief in them or let it be taught if they can help it. And we think we should be derelict in our duty to ourselvs and humanity if, knowing as we do that hell and its monarch are only barbarous myths, we should not raise our voice against the self-seeking priests who endeavor to perpetuate a belief in them that they may fatten on the people's fears. The religion of Christ does not do even some good. All the good that comes out of Nazareth is the feeling of humanity over-topping the confines of the narrow creeds. It is the good in the human heart that must come out in spite of religion. This feeling has been seized upon by the priests and claimed as the result of religion, the same as they hav claimed credit for all progress, when the fact is they opposed it as long as they could, and only yielded to the inevitable. It was the Infidels, the heretics, who first agitated abolition. It is the heretics who hav been the pioneers in all works of reform. They hav so far succeeded in spite of the church, and then the church has turned around and claimed the credit.

We do not think Mr. Bixler would do wrong without the restraining power of the Christian religion and its corollary the devil, so he must want it for his wicked neighbor. The wicked neighbor will probably thank him for his good opinion, but will also probably prefer that he keep his devil for himself.

The assertion that it is the worthless and hard cases who applaud Col. Ingersoll's lectures is bosh. It is worse—it is a lie. The hard and worthless cases of a large city never go to hear an Infidel lecture. We were conversing a while ago with an old Californian—one who was out there in the mining times. He is a very intelligent man, who understands a good many subjects, and is now one of the editors of a New York daily. He does not believe in the devil now, and did not then. He said: "The California roughs were peculiar. They broke every commandment in the decalog, and only waited for more to be made to break them, but let any one question the Christian religion, and they would fight promptly, defending their faith with revolver and bowie-knife." It would hav been very dangerous for Col. Ingersoll to hav attempted to lecture in San Francisco in the early days, although now, when civilization has replaced the barbarism of the mines, he can do so without fear. Any time between '50 and '60 these "worthless and hard" Christians would hav shot him on sight. We hav attended several of the Colonel's lectures in this city, and we know—what Mr. Bixler confesses he does not—that the class who attend are very far from the hard cases. His audiences are of the most intelligent and wealthy people, and the applause comes from them. Worthless and hard cases are conspicuous by their absence. Mr. Bixler's informant would probably judge anybody a worthless and hard case who applauded an Infidel lecturer. If he wants to judge of the character of Freethinkers, let him attend one of our conventions. At Hornellsville there is a lager beer saloon just out of the lobby of the Opera House. The proprietor boarded at the same hotel at which we stopped while there. One morning at the breakfast-table some one of the towns-people asked, "Well, Jim, getting rich off the Freethinkers?" "No," said Jim, with an expression of deep disgust, "no saloon will get rich off from them. There ain't been a d——d one in. They are no good." Jim is a Catholic.

The fear of death is an unfortunate legacy bequeathed to man by the Christian scheme. Of what use is it to hold out the promis of "Christ waiting with outstretched arms to embrace him and carry him up into a glorious heaven" when there is no glorious heaven and no waiting Christ? How cruel to scare the dying with the fear of a burning lake and the devil when the devil and the lake are myths! Better a thousand times that they should lie down calmly and say, "I hav done the best I knew in this world, I will do the best I can in the next when I get there, and if there is no more life for me I will sleep." The Christian believes there is either an eternity of agony or an eternity of bliss. And he knows that, according to the orthodox belief, there is not one chance in ten million of his going to eternal bliss. What consolation is there in the thought that an infinitesimal portion of the race is in paradise and all the rest are in a seething hell? If the Christian doctrin were true, if heaven and hell were realities, then might friends hold out hopes to dying men; but the hope would be so small that it could not afford much consolation. The last hours of departing friends cannot be made pleasant by bringing to their minds the fear of hell, or showing them a heaven they cannot hope to reach. Death is as necessary as life; and had not the Christian religion filled men's minds with pictures of eternal agony they would not fear to die more than they fear to go to sleep. One would think that if Christianity was such a comforter in the hour of death it would hav reconciled its own founder to his death. But it did not. Christ was a coward upon the cross. And what an innumerable multitude of Christians hav gone down to the grave in fear and trembling, excited by the dread of hell, and knowing how small were their chances of Christ "waiting with outstretched arms to carry them up into a glorious heaven!" And how many men who had no hope of heaven nor fear of hell hav quietly lain down and passed away, fearless and untormented by shrieking fiends! Which is the better way, which the most consoling—to die as did Socrates or as did Jesus? There was no consolation for Christ in the Christian religion, while there was an infinit deal in the philosophy of Socrates.

It is not profitable to cultivate a belief in Christianity because it is not profitable to cultivate falsehood. Believing that to be religious is to be superstitious, it is culpable to inculcate still further the superstition. It is hypocrisy, or worse. The gain made by emerging from the the ocean of superstition is substantial. It is a step from ignorance to knowledge, from falsehood to truth. If it is better to know the truth than to believe in error, then is the step one of vast importance. To get rid of superstition is to throw off a slavish fear and stand erect as becomes a man. In throwing away all superstition we get rid of the burden of the priesthood, an incubus that has hung for centuries around the neck of man, dragging him down to the dust of servitude. It is throwing open the barred and grated prison doors and letting the mind step out into the free air. It is a relief from the delusions of theology; from deceit and lying. Instead of crawling in the dust it is to walk erect. It is to be a man. No man bound by creeds can fearlessly investigate anything. He is always afraid of finding something counter to his creed. If he finds a fact in conflict with his Bible he throws the fact aside and clings to the error. Liberalism has made it possible for such men as Darwin and Huxley, Tyndall and Haeckel, to pursue their scientific studies without inquisitorial ignorance sitting in judgment on their work. It givs freedom to think, to know. No Liberal was ever read out of our ranks for knowing too much. There are no heresy hunters among us, poking around among our thoughts, prying into the secrets of our hearts. Liberalism givs liberty; Liberalism dethrones faith and enthrones reason. It civilizes mankind and fills the world with light, with science. Those only who hav emerged from the ocean of superstition can know how glorious it is to be free. To be obliged to suppress our thoughts is an abject slavery we would not be in for worlds. We do not want a hell for ourselvs nor for our neighbor.

We thank Mr. Bixler on behalf of Mr. Bennett for his kind wishes, and hope he will see that in throwing away superstition and embracing Liberalism he has made a solid, substantial gain.

"A Painful Omission."

Now that the grave has closed over the remains of the late President, one fact stands out which cannot fail to excite painful emotions, especially in view of the eulogies pronounced on his Christian character.

During the long and trying illness which his chief physicians hav recently declared was incurable from the outset, there is no record that he was ever visited by a minister of the gospel, that religious service was performed at his bedside, or that his sufferings were soothed by religious consolation in any form.

He wert to his dread account just as he was shot down, so far as the sacred offices of religion are concerned, which hav been so profuse since his death.

No man is pure enough in this life not to need preparation for eternity, and thankful is every true Christian for time of repentance before the final summons. Even the just man is said to sin daily.

Whoever may be responsible for this extraordinary omission must look back to the lost opportunity with sad feelings, from the consciousness that the error can never be made good. It was perhaps proper from a medical point of view, though opinions differ widely on this point in the profession, to isolate the patient as was done. But above Cabinet, above friends, above kindred, the door should hav always been open for the minister of Christ, who carries with him the symbol of faith and the hope of salvation.

Why it was kept closed we do not know; but the fact shocks the moral sensibilities of a Christian people.

The above is from the Sun, and is a specimen of pious twaddle which we should not hav expected to see in the columns of our usually level-headed contemporary.

The absence of ministers from the bedside of our late President has been remarked very often, and various reasons are assigned. Probably the correct explanation is that the President was too sick to be bored by conceited men, who could not tell him how to die any better than he knew himself. Mr. Garfield was a very liberal Campbellite. In his younger days he was a sort of preacher in that sect. But as he grew older he grew Liberal, even for a sect that is itself regarded by the regular orthodox as a little heretical. He probably did not feel the need of a minister, and it would hav been cruel of his attendants and physicians to hav allowed one to force himself upon him.

The consolations of religion are very meager to a man in his senses, and we believe Gen. Garfield had his the most of the time. In his case, too, the fact that he was shot by a religious fanatic would tend to still further deprive religion of its power to comfort. He was just as well prepared to go to his "dread account" the day he was shot as he could hav been had all the ministers in Christendom prayed by his bedside. He had tried to liv an honest and honorable life, wronging no one, doing good when he could, and seeking the truth to the best of his ability. If such a life will not prepare one for the grave, all the religious rites of all the churches cannot do it. A clear conscience is a man's best friend and most-needed minister in the hour of death. We believe Gen. Garfield had that, and having that he needed no priest.

The statement that "above friends, even above kindred, the door should hav always been open for the minister of Christ" is horrible! What right has a self-appointed expounder of a self-asserting creed to force his way into a sick room? Of the faith he pretends to explain he can know nothing. His words can be but repetitions of what he has been told. He knows no more of heaven than his victim. His symbol of faith is borrowed; his hope of salvation is only a hope.

This placing a stranger above kindred simply because he is a minister is barbarous. It is impertinence in the minister to ask it; it is slavish in the friends to grant it. The custom has come down from a time when superstitious men thought the priests could control all their affairs, even their life, and they consequently besought their intervention on all occasions. It is the same spirit which later placed the priests on equal footing with kings and led to the disastrous wedding of church and state. In these times, when ministers are only paid advocates of ignorance, the exponents of views held by a certain number of people, and hav no power over anything but themselvs, it is in conflict with good sense to let them annoy sick people with lurid pictures of a hell which not one man in ten million could escape if it existed, or hold out a hope of a heaven which none could reach under the conditions imposed by Christian faith and foolishness.

If the moral sensibilities of the Christian people were shocked by the absence of ministers, how much more would common sense and a people's love hav been outraged by the presence of those who would only hav brought to the sufferer's mind the fact that it was a man called of God, equally with the ministers, that laid him low.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this conntry—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

Our Spiritual friends of the Banner of Light hav published a discourse purporting to be from "Spirit Thomas Paine." It may be—we do not say it is not—but it reads very much like all of Mrs. Richmond's communications, containing the same glittering generalities, no more like the clear, incisiv, convincing language of the works that we know to be Paine's than black is like white. We will not say that the spirit of Thomas Paine does not exist, but a perusal of this discourse will go a long way to convince anybody conversant with his writings that if he did write it, he has lost a good deal of his nativ common sense somewhere between this world and the next. No one can read this jumble of words and then say the author of the "Age of Reason" and "Rights of Man" wrote them:

"Knowledge upon any given subject is the basis of the exercise of all reason. As a fact in the universe of human progress intuition takes its place, and being a fact it is demonstrated beyond the possibility of denial. Having taken its place, it behooves all thinking minds to adjudicate their reason in conformity with it."

The phrase "adjudicate their reason" may be good English, but Paine never used it. Furthermore, anybody who lets intuition take the place of knowledge will, as the worldly say, get badly left. To attribute such utterances as the above to Thomas Paine is taxing our credulity too much. We can hardly believe he ever used the language which we hav quoted.

As the time slips by we are reminded that many subscribers to The Truth Seeker are getting in arrears. We hope they will not long remain so. The summer months are the dullest months with newspapers, and the receipts are the lightest, while the expenses are just as heavy as at any time. We hope those friends whose subscriptions hav expired will bear this fact in mind, and renew at once, without waiting for us to send them bills. It takes time and money to send out hundreds of bills, which would be unnecessary if all would watch their tab and remit promptly. We hope to hear from those in arrears right away.

Another new candidate for Liberal favor is the Iconoclast, edited by W. H. Lamaster, and published at Noblesville, Indiana. It is a four-page monthly, at seventy-five cents per year. Number one of the first volume is before us. It is a very readable paper, and has kind words to say of all its older Liberal contemporaries. We giv it cordial greetings, and hope it may not encounter any rocks in its course.

The Banner of Light has been enlarged to twelve pages, but the price remains the same. The proprietors were compelled to take this step by the increasing pressure upon their columns. We are glad to see such evidence of prosperity, and hope the Banner will keep on waxing fatter and fatter as it grows old. It probably suits a larger class of Spritualists than any other distinctivly Spiritual journal.

On the last page of this issue will be found a list of lectures which J. E. Remsburg is prepared to deliver wherever he may be invited. He is a very superior lecturer, and we cordially recommend him to all Liberal Leagues and societies contemplating having a course of lectures this winter. His address is Atchison, Kan.

During the month of October Mr. Bennett may be addressed at Jerusalem, Palestine, care of Cook's Tourists' Agency; during November, at Bombay, India, care same Agency; and during December at Colombo, Ceylon.

We hav plenty more of those colored posters on hand which we will gladly send to any friend who takes enough interest in The Truth Seeker to aid in extending its circulation.

Base-Rock Principles.

I hav just read the call of T. C. Leland to attend the annual Congress of the Liberal League, but as a lack of means will prevent the presence of a represenativ from this section (southern Oregon), please giv me space for a suggestion relativ to "base-rock principles" which need to be brought to the surface for discussion.

1. Woman, being the equal coöperator in the production and destiny of the race, has an absolute equal right to share in its government, and until her influence for good is as paramount in every department as it is in a well ordered family, all other reforms are but of secondary importance and cannot be achieved.

2. Woman has the absolute right to say when, and under what conditions, she shall be taxed with the burden of offspring, for it is certain that there cannot be any further improvement by nobler men until women are placed in better conditions for their production.

3. It seems nonsense to talk of equal rights while the rights of women, the bigger and better half of all the people, are ignored, and while the Indians, who hav a prior right by heritage and possession, are held by popular sentiment as having no rights but that of extermination. Surely women, Indians, and foreigners (Chinamen included) hav the rights of humanity, which are greater than mere citizenship. Therefore the progress of the Liberal League should embrace the rights of every human being under the control of the United States government.

And inasmuch as all new countries are in process of rapid settlement, measures should be adopted to limit the increase of population within the bounds to which food can be increased for its support. Hence, the National Liberal League should adopt a memorial to the Senate and House of Represenativs to giv to women citizenship, to the Indians and foreigners protection, to abolish the Comstock laws, and to facilitate the object for which the Institute of Heredity is organized, to the end that there may be "fewer and better children" instead of starvation for the generation to come. Respectfully, John Beeson.

The defenders of liberty are compelled to be the foes of the church. Not only does the church support every throne in Europe, but also the similar injustice of majority rule here. It is in this way that she compels the minority to help support that which they hold to be the worst foe of human happiness. Every law upon our statue books to-day that is inconsistent with universal human rights is owing to the fact that the barbarous legislation of the Hebrews has been ascribed to divine inspiration. The same is true of the slavery and degradation of woman. For her every cup of human joy, liberty, and justice has been polluted with the foul scrapings of the sanctuary. To lick up the dust beneath the dirty feet of priests has been one of her constant duties from that day to this. Her chance to be wrongfully accused and condemned has been almost equally certain in every age. Inspired by the same religious ideas, many a women accused of witchcraft has been flung into the water. If she drowned, she was innocent; but, if she could swim, she was adjudged guilty, taken out, and burned to death. Beneath the teaching of the church, to be a mother has been a crime, and not to be one a still greater sin. Her chance of justice has been something like the present opportunity of medical students in Maine, where no one can graduate in medicin unless he has had regular practice in a dissecting-room, and no bodies can be lawfully dissected except those of criminals which hav been executed, and capital punishment has been abolished. In other words, the wise law-makers of Maine say: "You can't graduate unless you hav dissected a subject. You can't hav a subject unless somebody is hung. We don't allow anybody to be hung." In the same way, Calvinistic theology says:

"You can and you can't,
You will and you won't,
You'll be damned if you do,
And damned if you don't."

Thousands of women hav no more chance to be virtuous and happy in modern society—whose God is the church—than the Calvinist reprobate had to be saved.

THE DRUIDS AND DRUIDISM.

But I am digressing. Let me return to the old Druidic temple and say a little about the nature of Druidism. Some fifty or seventy-five feet from the outer circle of the old temple are planted two stones with smooth upper surfaces. In one is cut in large size the Druidic symbol of the trinity, or god, consisting of three straight lines in the form of the letter A, with a middle line coming down between the two outer ones, and not quite united at the top. This symbol is said to represent the first word ever spoken, and to be the name of God embodied in the trinity of light, truth, and purity. On the other stone is represented in circles the twelve signs of the zodiac, or the sun in its journey of the year. The Druids based their religion, their belief in God, their holy days and ceremonies, upon the sun in its various positions in the different signs. A winding pathway, six feet in width, and bordered by upright stones, led from the temple to where these two stones are planted. It struck me that the latter place was a most holy spot in their worshipful ceremonies, and that here perhaps the chief Druids gathered for their most holy observances.

Druidism was truly a religion of philosophy; its high priests were men of learning and science. The priesthood was divided into three classes—the Druids, the Bards, and the Ovades. The Druid has been classified as the trunk and support of the whole, the Bard the ramification from that trunk, arranged in beautiful foliage, and the Ovade the young shoot growing up, insuring a prospect of permanency to the sacred grove. The whole body was ruled by an Arch-Druid elected by lot from the senior brethren, who were the most learned and the best born. The Druids, among the ancient Britons, occupied a position very similar to the magii, or the wise men, of ancient Persia. They were familiar with astronomy, and it is claimed for them they were well informed in nearly all the sciences. Winwood Reade says: "It can easily be proved that the science of astronomy was not unknown to the Druids. One of their temples in the island of Lewis, in the Hebrides, bears evident signs of their skill in the sciences. Every stone in the temple is placed astronomically. The circle consists of twelve equidistant obelisks, denoting the twelve signs of the zodiac. The four cardinal points of the compass are marked by lines of obelisks running out from the circle, and at each point subdivided into four more. The range of obelisks from north, and exactly facing the south, is double, being two parallel rows, each consisting of nineteen stones. A large stone in the center, thirteen feet high, and of the perfect shape of a ship's rudder, would seem as a symbol of their knowledge of astronomy being made subservient to navigation, and the Celtic word seren, for star, ruth·iee, "a guide to direct the course," proves such to have been the case. This is supposed to have been the winged temple which Erastosthenes says that Apollo had among the Hypoboreans—a name which the Greeks applied to all nations dwelling north of the pillars of Hercules.

Julius Cæsar gave the first definite account of the Druids of any Roman writer, after his excursion to Gaul and Britain, more than sixty years before our era. In his "De Bello Gallico" he narrated that all the men of any rank or dignity in Gaul were included among either the Druids or the Equites or nobles. The former were the religious guides of the people, as well as the chief expounders and guardians of the law. On those who refused to submit to their decisions they had the power of inflicting severe penalties, of which excommunication from society was the most to be dreaded. As they were not a hereditary caste, and enjoyed exemption from service in the field, as well as payment of taxes, admission to the order was eagerly sought after by the youth of the country. The course of training which a novice had to submit to was protracted, extending sometimes over twenty years. All instruction was communicated orally, but for certain purposes they had a written language in which they used the Greek characters. The president of the order, whose office was elective, and who enjoyed the dignity for life, had supreme authority among them; they taught that the soul is immortal. Astrology, geography, physical science, and natural theology were their favorite studies. Britain was the headquarters of Druidism, but once every year a general assembly of the order was held within the territories of the Carnutes in Gaul, probably in the neighborhood of the Dreux. Their chief deity was identified by Cæsar with Mercury of the Romans.

Cicero, in his treatise on divination, written a few years later, introduces his brother Quintus as remarking on the existence among the Gauls and Britons of augurs or soothsayers known by the name of Druids. With one of these—Divitiacus, an Æduan—Quintus said he was well acquainted. Diodorus Siculus, a contemporary of Cicero, as already observed, wrote of the Druids, that there were among the ancient Gauls bards, certain philosophers and theologians named Druids, and that they were soothsayers. He also alluded to the similarity of their philosophy with that taught by Pythagoras, Strabo, and Pomponius Mela, distinguished Roman geographers, also made mention of the Druids.

The elder Pliny also wrote with reference to this remarkable people; he narrated in what veneration they held the mistletoe, a clinging plant which grows upon the oak. Groves of oak were their chosen retreats. The oak was accepted as representative of the strength of deity, and whatever grew upon it was held to be a gift from heaven. This was especially the case with the mistletoe. It was revered as a valued blessing from the divine source, and possessed the power of curing nearly all diseases to which human flesh is heir. The name given to it by the Druids in their language signified All-Heal, and its virtues were believed to be as great as its name implied. Pliny also mentioned a peculiar charm held in high veneration by the Druids—the Anguineum, or snake's egg. It was said to be produced from the saliva and frothy sweat of a number of serpents writhing in an entangled mass, and to be tossed up in the air as soon as formed. The fortunate Druid who managed as it fell to catch it in his sagum, or cloak, rode off at full speed on a horse that had been in waiting for him, pursued by the serpents until they were stopped by a running stream. A genuine specimen of the egg when thrown into the water, it was believed, would float against the current, even if incased in gold. This, of course, will strike the reader as being decidedly mythical, but Pliny declared he had seen one. He described it as about the size of a moderately large round apple, with a cartilaginous rind, studded with cavities like those on the arms of a polypus.

Tacitus, in describing the attack made on the Island of Mona (Angelsea) by the Romans under Suetonius Paulinus, represents the legionaries as being awe-struck on landing, by the appearance of a band of Druids, who, with hands uplifted toward heaven, poured forth terrible imprecations on the heads of the invaders. The strength and courage of the Romans, however, were too much for the Britons, and the imprecations of the extra-religious Druids were not sufficient to save them. They were put to flight, and the groves of Mona, wherein they had solemnly worshiped, were ruthlessly cut down.

By the writings of Lampridus and Vospiscus, two annalists, and Scriptores Historiæ Auguste, we get the information that the Druids introduced into their sacred service an order of Druidesses, who were prophetic women. This was showing greater consideration to the gentler sex than has been done by any other prominent system of religion. Vospiscus tells upon the authority of his grandfather, who had the story from the future emperor himself, that it had been foretold to Diocletian by one of these Druidesses, that he would wear the purple after he had slain a wild boar. Many years after, when Deocletian found himself, on the death of Numerian, unexpectedly declared emperor of the troops, he at once cut down with his sword Arrius Aper, regarding whom dark suspicions were afloat, exclaiming, "At length I have slain the fated wild boar," and thus fulfilled the prophecy delivered to him by the weird Druidess. Probably this was quite as well as prophecies have usually been fulfilled.

There are several others of the ancient writers who spoke of the Druids, but it is not necessary to quote what they said. They generally spoke in terms of respect and approbation. It is unquestionable that they were an earnest, sincere, worthy people; that their religion was one of the very oldest known on earth, older far than Judaism and Christianity, and that the latter especially contains little or nothing not in Druidism. There is much justice in the claim that it is the parent of the various systems of religions and mythology that have been known among men. All seem to have degenerated with the lapse of years, increasing the number of their gods and adding to the mass of their absurd superstitions. It is very probable that Druidism retained its purity quite as well as any religious system that has existed. Of its great antiquity there can be no doubt. It had flourished many centuries in Britain and Gaul previous to the conquests of Cæsar, some believing that the time of existence previous to that far exceeded a thousand years, and probably several of them. It was old when Cæsar visited Britain, and is said to then have been in its decline. It is uncertain whether any system of religious belief can claim an earlier existence, and certainly Christianity can claim little or no originality, or that it has anything of any value not possessed by Druidism.

The belief of the birth of the son of righteousness on the 25th of December, and the observance of that day in commemoration of the event, when holly, laurel, and other evergreens were gathered to decorate their dwellings on their Christmas day, was held among them long before the advent of Christianity. There is no doubt but what the church borrowed that festival from the pagans of Britain, Gaul, and of the Mithraitic worshipers of Persia, as it has many others of the rites, ceremonies, and dogmas which were pagan property. If Christianity were to be divested of everything borrowed from the pagan systems it would have nothing left save its persecutions for opinion's sake, with perhaps the confession of sin to priests. All the rest is borrowed in whole cloth. Druidism, like the other ancient religious systems, had its principal God Hu, who was simply the personification of the sun; they had their Hesus, the son of God, and their redeemer; they had their Virgin Ceridwen, sometimes called the Consort of God, and even Mother of God. These are the Druidic trinity, at least as true and as sensible as the Christian trinity, and far more original.

A volume of large size might be written in explanation of the details of the religion of Druidism, but that is not my present purpose, nor will time and space admit of it. I have doubtless said quite enough, and I will hasten on and complete my letter. I will, however, remark that though Druidism has been greatly crushed by the cruelties of devotees of the current system, although younger, less original, and no purer, it is not still dead; there are many yet alive who cherish the faith; and gorsedds even exist in New York and other places in America, and they often meet together, regarding their religion as a true natural religion. They still regard the sun as the great central power, "the eye of light," and all the great forces of nature are regarded with appropriate veneration and respect. They meet and part in the name of truth, and their motto is, "Truth against the world." I have had an opportunity of meeting with them a few times and become much interested in their views, and desirous of learning what I could relative to this very ancient religious system, I was thereby induced to visit this place while on my long tour.

Before leaving it for the present I wish to say that slanders have been uttered against it. It has been said that Druids practiced human sacrifice, but those best acquainted with the history of that people assure me that it is untrue; they did not sacrifice human beings. Many of the old systems did, and the numbers of human beings which have been sacrificed to appease the anger of the gods are fearful to contemplate. That the Jews are among those who practiced human sacrifice there is no room to doubt. Such passages from the Bible as the following fully confirm it: "And they" (the Israelites) "served their idols: which were a snare unto them. Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, and shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and their daughters, whom they sacrificed to the gods of Canaan; and the land was polluted with blood" (Ps. cvi, 36-38). The sacrifice of children was continued by the Jews down to the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And so early as the time of Abraham, when his god commanded him to offer up his son Isaac, the command seems not to have shocked the old patriarch in the least, and he went about preparing the altar and getting ready for the bloody deed with as much composure as though the victim had been a lamb. It was the same when Jephthah sacrificed his daughter; though he regretted to part with his only child, he thought the solemnity of his oath and the will of his god required it, and he did not flinch. Many Jewish children were sacrificed in the immediate neighborhood of Jerusalem; and on the Mount of Olives were sanctuaries of Milcom, Chemosh, and Ashtoreth dating from the time of Solomon, by whom they were established. Jeremiah, speaking of the people of his country, said, "They have built the high places of Tophet. . . . to burn their sons and daughters in the fire" (Jer. vii, 31). Ezekiel makes the same charge against the people (xxiii, 39). Again he says for his God: "Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live. And I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate" (Ezek. xx. 25, 26). That Manasseh and Ahaz, kings of Judah, sacrificed their children is narrated in Kings and Chronicles. It is fair to suppose they only followed the customs of their times. That Yahweh approved of such sacrifice, and that he gave instructions relative to the horrible practice, the following quotation will suffice to prove: "No devoted thing which a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and all of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death" (Lev. xxvii, 28, 29). But as to the Druids, upon the assurance of those who ought to know, I wish to exonerate them from the bloody practices of the devotees of Moloch, Chemosh, Baal, and Yahveh.

While wending my way back to the village, and not far from the old Druidic temple, I saw a stone monument, or slab, six or seven feet high, three feet broad, and six inches thick. On it, in large letters, is this inscription: "Stranger, halt! I am placed here to commemorate the virtues of ———, who, after managing the chain-work on my right side for the space of twenty-one years, much to the benefit of all mankind, died, and lies enshrined herein. Age, 69—1840." The name of the person to be commemorated had been cut out, and I am unable to give any further explanation about this stone.

Upon descending from the hill I called upon the venerable Myfyr Morganwg (pronounced Muvir Morgano) and exchanged pictures with him. He expressed many good wishes for the safety of my journey and my safe arrival at home. He also sent his kind regards to such Brahmans as I might meet in India. On taking leave of him I felt that I had met a good and remarkable man.

The ride down the narrow Taff Valley is filled with picturesque and romantic scenery. At the end of the valley road is Cardiff, one of the most important towns in South Wales. It is situated on the river Taff, about two miles from its afflux in the Bristol Channel. Much of the town looks modern, as though recently built. It has considerable shipping, and presents an appearance of prosperity. Here we changed railroads, and took the one running by the shores of Bristol Channel. Twelve miles from Cardiff is Newport, a young town of considerable size, having a good harbor, a good trade, and several flourishing iron manufactories. Soon we came to Chepstow, situated on the river Wye, near its confluence with the Severn. Steamers ascend as far as Chepstow, and barges go above. This place has the highest tide of any place in the world. The surging water rushes up the Bristol Channel, up the river Severn and the river Wye, and rises to a hight of fifty feet, and even the extreme hight of seventy-two feet has been reached, which seems hardly possible. The tide was going out when I arrived, and I did not wait to see it come in and take note of its altitude.

As I am now leaving Wales, a few words respecting its people will not be out of place. They seem a hardy, industrious, intelligent, peaceful, well-disposed people. If they have not remarkable brilliance, they possess many excellent qualities. There are places in Edinburgh and Glasgow where a person might justly feel very unsafe at night, and even in the daytime if it was known he had some money with him. There are plenty of such places in Ireland; but in Wales one realizes a feeling of security and safety, and that he is among honest people. They have the same fault that prevails in all parts of Great Britain and Ireland—of using altogether too much intoxicating liquors, and they are very religious, but it cannot be denied that they are industrious, plodding, and frugal. But little extreme poverty is seen here. All seem to have something to do, and to possess a will to be about it. There are several contrasts between the Irish and the Welsh. While both have been seriously oppressed by the unjust land laws which prevail in both countries, as well as in England, evictions not unfrequently taking place in each country, especially in Ireland, the disposition shown by the Irishman and the Welshman is often very different. The Irishman will lie in ambush behind the hedge and shoot his landlord, while the Welshman, though he just as keenly feels the injustice that has been done him, makes no demonstration about it; he quietly packs up his worldly affairs, and probably takes himself peacefully off to America.

The Welsh language is largely spoken among the lower classes. I should judge it is patronized quite as much as the English, which seems singular in so small a country, with constant intercourse with England. I judge they are a people slow to change. They are undoubtedly a people of very mixed blood. Whether any of the blood of the original stock who, scores of thousands of years ago, used to live in caves and lay their bones down with those of the mammoth, the elephant, the hippopotamus, the rhinoceros, etc., has descended to the present day, or whether the people of ancient Troy or Phœnicia, or Greece or Iberia (ancient Spain), were the progenitors of the present Welshmen, it is pretty hard to determine; but it is well known that the Romans, the Saxons, the Normans, the Danes, the Celts, the Gaels, and the Flemings made warlike excursions into their country, conquering them first, then settling among them and blending the blood of each together, thus causing the product to be so mixed that it is very difficult to say what it is. But as in our own and other countries, it is probable that the race has been improved by this admixture. The Flemings mixed especially with the portion in the vicinity of Swansea and other parts of south Wales. and the effects are quite visible to the close observer,

Wales is a small country, but her sons have been brave in battle. They have had to contend with many more powerful nations, with whom they had to cope on unequal terms; but they have been valiant and patriotic. Their last great struggle for national existence was contending against the armies of Edward the First, of England, the greatest general of his time. Though overpowered, they were not conquered. Though their Prince Llewellyn was slain at the fords of Wye, the English king was glad to compromise with them and grant them the most honorable terms. They asked that a Welsh prince, born in the country, and unable to speak English, should rule over them. This Edward conceded, and effected it by having his queen journey to Carvarnon to give birth to a prince. Since that time the king of England's oldest son has held the title of the Prince of Wales, though he never lives in the country. Later on, Henry Tudor, a Welshman, raised an army in Wales and marched against Richard the Third, who was slain in the battle of Bosworthfield by Sir Rhys, of Thomas of Caermarthen. Henry VII. then became king of England, and the mark of royalty became the old Druidic symbol, but simply reversed, the three straight lines meeting at a point at the bottom, in the shape of the letter V, with a perpendicular line in the middle. It is said that every highway government building, even to the smallest nails used by the government, bears this mark. This does not look much as though the Welsh were utterly conquered.

The South Wales Railway continues on to Gloucester, a fine old English town, situated on the Severn river, with a celebrated old cathedral, which I did not take the time to go and see. I here took another road in a southeast course to Swindon, and at a considerable distance, perhaps seventy-five miles. This part of England is very beautiful, and shows unmistakable evidence of the highest cultivation. The crops are abundant, but bespeak the bad quality of weather for harvesting. After waiting a while at Swindon, I took another train in a southwest course to Westbury. Here I took another slow train, passing by several pleasant villages to Salisbury. It was nearly six o'clock P. M. when the train arrived there; but as I had made the journey in this direction to visit the ruins of the ancient Druidic temple of Stonehenge, I wished to carry out the intention that night. I learned that the place I wished to visit is nine miles north of Salisbury. I soon made a bargain with a cabman to convey me out there with as little delay as possible, though he insisted upon twelve shillings (three dollars) to make the trip. We were very soon rolling along over a very smooth road toward the north. Two miles out the site of the old Salisbury Castle was reached. Of course, I had to climb the eminence where the castle stood, and where the tumbled-down ruins now are, and enjoyed a fine view of the town, two miles away, and the fine plains all around me. Seven miles from Salisbury we passed through the little old town of Amesbury, which, however, has a history, as all these old English towns have. Just before we reached the village we passed a rather comfortable, fine-looking building, which my Jehu called a "Union," where a considerable number of people of both sexes reside upon the community plan. The young man said they were in a flourishing condition, but more than this I could not learn from him.

Stonehenge stands upon elevated ground, called Old Sarum Hill, in the center of the great Salisbury Plains in Wiltshire. The Plains remind me much of a large Illinois undulating prairie, with the exception that the Plains is a much thinner, poorer soil, being a very thin layer of earth on a vast chalky formation. The farms are large, the residences a long way apart, and much of the land unfenced. The crops, of course, are light, and but little of the land is cultivated, it being greatly used for sheep pasturage. The same fertile appearance which abounds in nearly all parts of England is wanting here.

Stonehenge is truly a wonder, though at a distance, standing by itself on a naked plain, it very easily strikes one at first as not being equal to his expectations; but upon close observation, when the massive stones, twenty-four feet high, six or seven broad, and three or four feet thick, and weighing forty tons, are immediately before one, he is struck with wonder how a primitive people could convey these stones from the shortest distance whence they could be obtained—sixteen miles, and some of them from Devonshire, fifty or sixty miles away. This is thought to have been the cathedral of the Arch-Druid in olden times, perhaps three thousand years ago. When these stones were erected where they now stand cannot be told.

In the morning I reached the little old Druidic temple at Pontypridd just as the sun had risen and was shedding its rays benignly over the earth. I worshipped, as I stated; and now after a pretty busy day visiting many towns, viewing a great deal of beautiful landscape, and riding over many miles of country, I reached the greater antique stone temple at Stonehenge just as the sun was setting, and again it was a fitting place and hour to worship. I improved my opportunity.

The large stones which I have mentioned were originally planted in a round oval circle, one hundred and eight feet in diameter, but with the lapse of centuries some of them have fallen over, though more than half of them are still standing. The stones are square at the upper end, save a tenon half-spherical in form, perhaps ten inches across and four or five inches high. On these upright stones is placed a very heavy cap, or impost stone, resting on two of the upright stones, they being some sixteen feet in length, four feet wide and two feet thick, and weighing probably fifteen or twenty tons. A row of these heavy cap-stones originally went all round the circle of the temple save at the west end, which seems to have been left for an opening or entrance. The upright stones do not stand close together, but somewhere eight or ten feet apart, while the impost or cap-stones reach from one stone to another, making a continuous and very heavy cap or coronal to the entire edifice. On the under side of each cap-stone mortises or indentations are cut out to admit the tenons on the upright stones, thus enabling the capstones to fit close upon the uprights, the tenons of which hold the capstones in their proper places. The capstones are also dovetailed together. Within the circle named are five pairs of the upright stones, with the caps forming trilithons or triplets, disconnected with each other; besides a circle of smaller stones, about six feet high. There were originally sixty of the large upright stones in the outer circle and thirty imposts to correspond. I will not say that all the upright stones are twenty-four feet in length, but I measured one that had fallen over and found it to be that length. Twenty-four of the uprights are still standing, six having fallen over. The inner circle is rather more than eight feet from the inner part of the outer circle and consisted of thirty stones, six feet above the ground; nineteen of them have fallen over, eleven still remaining upright. Thus the walk or corridor between the two circles is three hundred feet in length, or circumference. The central portion is an oval, formed of ten stones, from sixteen to twenty-two feet above the ground. They stand in pairs and have imposts, but are not connected. Within still are a number of smaller stones, some of which are standing and some are not. Near the open end of the adytum is a large stone, supposed to be the altar. It is a long slab of bluish, coarse marble, sixteen feet long, four broad, and twenty inches thick. The entire original number of the stones are supposed to have numbered one hundred and forty, but some of them have been broken up and carried away to make houses, mend roads, etc.

Around this rock temple without a roof are two rows or circles of mounds and ditches. Some of the mounds are fifteen feet high and the ditch is thirty feet broad. These mounds or tumuli have been dug into and the bones of animals have been found in them, and ornaments of bronze, and even of gold in a few instances. They were undoubtedly the burial-places of races of people who occupied this country long, long ago. It is thought by some that there is no connection between the mounds and the heavy stones of the temples, and that the mounds are of the greatest antiquity. These burrows and tumuli are met with in various parts of England and Wales, as well as in other parts of the world. The open air stone temples are also very numerous in various parts of the British Isles, in France, India, and even in Persia. They are what is left of the works of great religious races, who assembled in these open temples to worship the source of light and life, which they revered.

At Abury, Ayebury, or Avebury, also in Wiltshire, and some twenty miles north of Stonehenge, is a series of these stone circles, in respect of numbers a far greater collection than at the latter place. I intended to have visited it, but it was late in the week, and a little inconvenient to reach, and I abandoned it. In those circles there are in all 650 blocks of stone, varying from five to twenty feet in hight above the ground, and from three to twelve feet in thickness. One hundred were raised on and around a flat and circular area, fourteen hundred feet in diameter. These stones were bounded by a deep ditch and lofty bank, which inclosed the whole work, except places of entrance to the temple. The area and the embankments comprise more than twenty-eight acres. About half way up the slope was a terrace walk, possibly prepared for the use of spectators in times of worship. Another temple of forty-five stones, some of them of immense size, is partly standing a little way north of the temple above referred to.

At Carnac in Brittany, France, is the remains of a stone temple far more extensive, the stones reaching the number of four thousand and covering a very large space of ground. Daru, in his "Historie Brentange," describes these temples and says they are at a great distance from any quarries where the stones could have been obtained.

The stone temples, cromlechs—flat stones of various sizes, many of them very large—resting like a table upon three uprights, are found in many parts of Wales, as well as the tumuli or mounds already spoken of. The cromlechs are supposed to have been erected for altars, and that on these the old Druids offered sacrifices in olden times. Large numbers of these temples and cromlechs have been destroyed by the vandals of modern times, and the stones have been used for various purposes. But John Ruskin, M. P., has recently very properly procured the passage of an act by Parliament making it a penal offense to destroy these relics of the past. This will doubtless prevent further destruction of the kind. I may also remark that measures are being taken to restore Stonehenge to its original condition.

After looking over Stonehenge and meditating upon the work of men in the far past until it was dark, I turned my face toward Salisbury, where we arrived at nine o'clock, finding the August evening air decidedly cold in riding over Salisbury plains. I looked over the town for an hour, watching the people doing up their Saturday night marketing, and then retired to rest, feeling that I had done a very fair day's work.

Sunday opened pleasant, and feeling that there was nothing further to detain me at Salisbury I took the one Sunday train for London, approaching it from the southwest. The first part of the hundred miles is of the light, hard soil variety, and the crops were not heavy; but after a while we reached a better country, with good crops, well-cultivated farms, and many very pleasant-looking towns.

I reached London at 1 P. M., soon finding Mr. Bridges, later calling upon my friend John S. Dryden, and taking dinner with Dr. T. S. Andrews and wife, of Kipton, Ohio, who are temporarily stopping in London. In the evening I listened to an able lecture by Dr. E. B. Aveling, at the Hall of Science, on the "Martyrs of Science in the Past and the Present." I would like to repeat some of his remarks, but I must close this long letter. I met at the hall many persons whom I got acquainted with while on my visit here last year.

Now, friends, if you will excuse this long letter I will try to be more brief in the future.

Good-bye, D. M. B.

A Tarry in London.

LONDON, ENGLAND, Sept. 12, 1881.

DEAR READERS: I have been in this great city and vicinity two weeks, and shall be till after the meeting of the International Congress in the latter part of the month, when I will push on with my journeying, hoping to complete it in reasonable time. This is indeed an immense, great city, and one cannot really realize it until they go over it from end to end and from side to side. A compact city twelve miles across each way must necessarily contain hundreds of thousands of houses and millions of people. One cannot see all of such a city in a few weeks, nor does he wish to see it all. The eternal sameness of hundreds of miles of dingy-looking dwellings in time ceases to be a novelty. One might live here for years and not see one half of the town. I do not doubt that thousands are born here who spend their lives here and go down to their graves and leave a large portion of this city unseen. It is only the most interesting places and the most attractive points one wishes to see; the rest soon becomes monotonous.

I gave you a tolerably full description of this city, or at least such parts of it as I saw, and it will hardly be worth while to repeat now what I said then. I have a good many persons to see, and many places. Distances from one part of the city to another are great, and consume time in making them. I have several business matters to look after, and considerable time to spend in writing, so that much I meet with will hardly be worth repeating. I will mention only such items as I think may interest you because they interested me.

Possibly I am inclined to talk a little too much about myself, but I will tell you how I am living here. For the first ten days I stopped at the Essex House, kept by a good Liberal, George Fowler. An eating-house on the first floor makes it very convenient for guests to obtain meals, light or heavy, as they want, at such times as they want them, and with moderate expense. But as my friends, Dr. T. S. Andrews and wife, of Ohio, were occupying a comfortable, pleasant room on the ground floor of a large, new dwelling but a short distance from where I was stopping, and as they concluded to take steamer for America, and I remembered how pleasantly I kept bachelor's hall last year in Rome, I concluded, as I still had some time to remain here, to change my quarters and try bachelor-hallism again. So here I am at No. 13 Chichester Houses, Great Eastern street, Bishopsgate, in the eastern-central portion of the city. I have a front room with a window on the street, with an area eight feet wide, protected by a high iron fence, and in course of the day I see thousands of persons and vehicles of all kinds passing as I sit by my table, so that I get tired of so many human and brute beings and wish for more quiet, though I have a fine opportunity for studying several phases of the world as it passes along before my eyes. Each person that goes hurrying past has a history, has had his troubles and trials, and has them still. Many look as though they are in comfortable circumstances, while many others appear to be in poverty's lowest estate. Many look tired and weary of life, while all look earnest and careworn. Oh, what a world this is, to be sure! I often think infinite power and infinite wisdom ought to have made a better job of it.

I have a grate in my room and can easily make a cup of tea, boil eggs, broil a steak and all that, for the room is duly furnished with all the little conveniences for housekeeping, and the weather is not so warm here as to make a little fire feel uncomfortable. I must tell you, if I can remember, all about laying in my supplies. First of all I ordered half a hundred of coal, seven pence ha'penny; a small loaf of bread, tuppence; quarter of a pound of butter, four pence; half a pound of cheese, five pence; quarter of a pound of boiled ham, five pence; quarter of a pound boiled beef, four pence; four pounds bologna sausage, tuppence; ten prime eggs, a shilling; two ounces gunpowder tea, tuppence; a pound of refined sugar, thrippence ha'penny; a can of Swiss concentrated milk, four pence; a jar of mixed pickles, eight pence; a jar of strawberry jam, five pence; one jar of orange marmalade, sixpence; one box of sardines, thrippence; one pound of sweetened tea cakes, four pence; one pound ditto—a better article—six pence; six small tarts, one shilling; salt, a penny; vinegar, a penny; pepper, a penny; two pounds apples, four pence; two pounds of pears, six pence; two pounds of plums, six pence; half a pound of Spanish grapes, four pence; half a pound of raisins, thrippence-ha' penny; one bunch radishes, three ha'pennies; two bunches of watercresses, a penny; four bunches of kindling wood, tuppence. Now I do not wish you to understand that I eat all these at one meal, for I have made several meals from the store, and have much left. I started a fire, boiled the eggs, and made a good cup of tea, the best I have had since I left America. Everybody here drinks black tea; I do not like it; it tastes too much like herbs; I prefer Japan, but not being able to find that I took the green. It does nicely. The first thing I had to do was to salt my butter; much of it comes to this market perfectly fresh, and people are expected to salt it to suit themselvs. I got, each morning, warm rolls enough to do me through the day, and with my salted butter they go very well. I pay six shillings sixpence per week for my room ($1.60), so I estimate I am living at a cost of about two shillings (50 cents) per day, which for London does pretty well, and I like it better than at a hotel, especially as it is so much cheaper. If I am remarkable for anything it is economy; in fact, it has been my salvation. As I sit here by my table I wish I could have a place as cosy and quiet every night while on the long journey before. I sweep up my carpet and keep quite tidy. I do not make a fire at every meal; the weather is not cold enough to require it, and I like cold tea and cold eggs very well. If I only had here the convenient little gas stove which wife and I have at home my cooking arrangements would be perfect, but I manage to get along very well. I would hardly answer for head cook in a first-class French hotel, but can get up a simple meal to suit myself. I wish some of you could drop in and see me when I am in; we certainly could have a nice little visit. I could give you a cup of tea, some cold meats, a boiled egg, some orange marmalade, some fruits, etc. I am sure that would do very well. I have done much worse many a time, and expect to again. If you conclude to call upon me you must come within the next two weeks, for soon after that time I will be off for Jerusalem.

I had been in London but a few days before I received an invitation from Mr. Bradlaugh to attend a meeting at his house of the Executiv Committee of the council pertaining to the International Congress. I found Mr. Bradlaugh's health much improved from what it has been since the brutal attack made upon him by fourteen constables or policemen to prevent him from taking his legitimate seat in Parliament on August 3d. That outrage, with the rough handling which Mr. Bradlaugh received, resulted in an attack of erysipelas, which caused not a little alarm. He still carries his left arm in a sling. The muscles of that arm were seriously injured by some of the fourteen legal bullies. Mr. Bradlaugh, with his large physique and great strength, would be a match for three or four strong men, but fourteen to one is almost too great odds, even for such a man as he to overcome.

I was struck with the Parliamentary ability which he evinced in discharging the duties of chairman of the two committees which held meetings in his room—the Executive Committee of the National Secular Society being the second. He seems very familiar with Parliamentary law, and insists upon a strict observance of it, by which business is transacted in a direct and expeditious manner, without the admission of outside irrelevant questions.

With regard to the place where the International Conference or Congress is to be held a few words may be in order. The Congress at Brussels last year decided, after an animated discussion, that the Congress should be held this year at Paris, and at the same time it enacted that the societies in each locality sending delegates to the Congress should organize and affiliate with the organized movement and send or appoint members of a general council which should meet in this city, London, in January, 1881, with other duties making necessary provisions for the assembling of Congress. Now Freethinkers are abundant in Paris, but unfortunately they are not harmonious. There are two antagonistic parties, the one being emphatically an anti-clerical party, making opposition to the church its distinctive object. This party is large, respectable, and many of its members wealthy. They are publishing and circulating tracts and pamphlets exposing the fallacies of orthodoxy and the faults of the priesthood. The other party join the most ultra Socialistic views, and even Communistic and Nihilistic theories, with their Freethought, and carry their ideas to such extremes as to render themselves impracticable and unduly irrational. This want of unity of thought between the two wings has led to active opposition, and they seem wholly disinclined to coöperate. Neither wing has affiliated with the international organization, and neither sent members or representatives to the Council here, though both were frequently requested to do so. Belgium, Germany, India, the United States, and Canada had representatives in the Council, but France had none, and took no steps in that direction. As it was the place of one or both of the organizations of Paris to ally themselves with the international movement, and to make due preparations for the holding of the Congress in their city, and as they did nothing of the kind, the Council were embarrassed as to how to act. A party was sent over to Paris from London to see if something could not be done to secure coöperation, with a view of holding the Congress in Paris in September. But neither party showed disposition to take any steps in the matter, and nothing could be effected. Then, when the time had come when a decision must be made and the announcements sent out, the Council decided that the Congress should be held in London, and the notices were issued accordingly. If the Paris friends would not take the initiatory steps in the matter, and did nothing toward preparing for the Congress, there seemed no way left but to hold the Congress here. Since that decision was made it seems that the ultra or extra-radical wing in Paris have resolved to hold a Congress in Paris. It may have delegates from other countries, but as they have not united with the international movement, the Congress they propose to hold cannot be the International organization inaugurated last year.

After the work of the committee was over Mr. Bradlaugh invited me to supper, at which his daughters and Mr. Swaagman, whom I got acquainted with last year at Brussels, were also present. A somewhat prolonged conversation appendixed the supper, in which English, French, and Spanish politics were the topics. Mr. Bradlaugh was in a conversational mood, and I was much interested with his remarks, and could but admire the familiarity he evinced with the politics and politicians of the various European countries. His observations were of a very interesting and instructive character. My visit was prolonged to a somewhat late hour.

Mr. Bradlaugh kindly invited me to accompany him on the 5th instant to Hanley in Staffordshire, some one hundred and thirty miles north, where he had engaged to make a speeeh to a trades union gathering, principally of potters. I was only too glad to accept the invitation, as I wished to visit that part of England, and was glad of the opportunity to make the journey with Mr. Bradlaugh and to listen to one of his open-air speeches. Accordingly, on Monday morning, Sept. 4th, I repaired betimes to the Easton station in the north part of the city, where I met Mr. Bradlaugh, and we took the northern-bound train at 9 A. M. I will here remark that Mr. Bradlaugh travels like a prince; consequently we occupied a first-class coach, and by arrangement of his we had a compartment to ourselves, which, besides taking note of the beautiful, undulatory, teeming country through which we passed, with the finely built and prosperous towns all along the way, afforded us an excellent opportunity for conversation. He was kind enough to review the circumstances attending his canvas for reelection to the House of Parliament, together with the injustice that has since been done him, including the brutal outrage done him on August 3rd, at the behest of the Conservative Tory members of the House, and from which violent attack his left arm is still suffering. I was on the ocean at the time this event occurred and had not seen a full account of it, and of course I was much interested with such particulars of the affair as he was pleased to give me of the onslaught which the devotees of bigoted Christianity and intolerant Conservativism saw fit to visit upon him.

The probable future aspects of his case were canvassed, and I noticed that his apprehension is that further opposition on the part of his opponents will be offered him when he again presents himself to take his seat in the House, when Parliament again meets, in November or February next, as he has a just and unquestioned right to do, having been legally elected and reëlected by the voters of Northampton. In this respect I observe that Mr. Bradlaugh hardly agrees with the people whom I have conversed with upon the subject. The general impression is that when Parliament meets again the opposition will give way, and that Mr. Bradlaugh will be allowed quietly to take his seat. But he knows the character of the church and aristocratic influences which are deadly opposed to his occupying a seat in the great legislative body of the couutry, and it is his opinion that the conflict, if not irrepressible, is not yet over, and that perhaps the bitterest part of the fight is yet to come. But this much may be regarded as a settled fact: Mr. Bradlaugh fully understands his rights in the premises, as well as the nature of the influences in opposition to him, and as he is not a man to tamely yield his rights, nor to act the coward's part in maintaining them, he is prepared to meet the enemy, in whatever form it may present itself, and will to the utmost defend his just and legal rights. It is my opinion that if brute force is again exercised to prevent his taking the seat which the people of Northampton have twice sent him to occupy, somebody will be hurt. In justice his constituents and to himself, he will use his best endeavors to represent them, and this he will contend for so long as he has life and strength. I hope that those who from a spirit of bigotry and unfairness have endeavored to crush him will have the good sense to relinquish their position and allow justice to be done, and that blood need not be spilt.

This opposition on the part of leading men in the church and in the state is making hosts of warm friends for Mr. Bradlaugh among the working classes in all parts of the kingdom. They regard him as their friend and champion; and knowing that great wrong has been done him, they will stand by him to the last. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand persons who have attended his public meetings over the country for the past few months have decidedly evinced their desire that he be accorded the seat which belongs to him. This sentiment is both strengthening and spreading; and if this injustice is continued, such a state of feeling will exist, and such a determined spirit be aroused, as will bring about a revolution in this country. Mr. Bradlaugh does not desire that any rash course should be taken by his friends, but that the unjust treatment toward him should be discontinued; but he will not flinch his duty, let the results be what they may. I noticed that he is known all along the way, and many greeted him with words of friendship and sympathy in the various towns through which we passed. There is probably hardly a man living who has warmer friends or bitterer enemies. When Parliament assembles again such a flood of petitioners will favor his being permitted to take his seat as have scarcely been placed to a petition before. Blank petitions are now being sent out in large numbers, and I am sure they will be well filled with names, and in due time forwarded to Parliament. What effect these will have remains to be seen.

I had some talk with Mr. Bradlaugh on the Irish question, and found that he is in favor of granting to Ireland all the rights and privileges due to her people, and says he would himself, if he had the power, grant her "home rule," giving her a home parliament and the right to legislate for herself, the same as with Canada, Australia, and other colonies. I think, however, that while he feels that though he was friendly with the Irish members of the House, and on more than one occasion evinced it in his official capacity, he has cause to think the same members acted with the Conservatives in opposition to himself, thus evincing that they are not capable of appreciating their best friends. Religious prejudices may have much to do with this Catholic opposition. Cardinal Newman has said he was opposed to an Atheist occupying a seat in the House, so perhaps it is in keeping that Catholic members should vote in the same direction. Intolerance has ever been a very strong characteristic of this great and original branch of the Christian church; and in this instance, as in many others, the Protestant branch seems to act fully in unison with the intolerance of the Catholics.

After Mr. Bradlaugh regains his seat in the House I have reason to believe that the next great reform he anticipates is a land reform bill. One of the greatest evils which England labors under is the miserable system of land tenure by entail—allowing a single individual to be the owner of hundreds of thousands of acres, while his own brother has not an acre. He is not in favor of rash or extreme measures that could not be practical, but advocates such moderate changes as need not produce a disastrous revolution, being more in favor of gradual evolution in English affairs than hurried revolution. He would, in the first place, advocate an act enabling land-owners to sell parts of their estates, and in the second place would encourage the same by a graduated taxation, making it heavy on lands in excess of a stipulated number of acres, making it generous to the land-owner, but effectually doing away with the system of entail, which has been a curse to England.

We arrived at Stoke, on Trent, before 2 P. M., where the Chairman, Mr. William Owens, and the Secretary, Mr. Charles Blower, of the Potters' Trades Union organization, of Hanley, met him, and inside of half an hour we four were in a carriage riding to Henley, some two miles away. The time for the speech was set at three o'clock. Large numbers of working men, and not a few women, were on the ground waiting for him. The place is a very pretty one, having in connection beautiful gardens, lawn tennis grounds, a large dancing floor, with an elevated place for the musicians, with summer-houses for refreshments. The grounds are much resorted to all through the summer season, and seems a place of rational enjoyment.

I could not help noticing the great respect and love which the working people bear toward Mr. Bradlaugh as evinced upon this occasion. They pressed forward toward him and wished to take him by the hand, but owing to the injured condition of his arms he begged them to excuse him from handshaking. Many expressions of high esteem were spoken to him. At the proper time four officers of the Trades Union, Mr. Bradlaugh, and myself occupied the platform, and about five thousand people gathered upon the dancing floor, and in a standing position listened closely to the speaking that took place. The chairman, Mr. Owens, made the opening remarks, alluding to the object of the meeting, the purposes of the Union, and what was to be gained by a union of earnest and intelligent working men. Mr. Secretary Blower followed with very timely remarks in the same direction, when two resolutions were presented to the meeting, the first pertaining to the rights and duties of working men; the second an earnest opinion that Mr. Bradlaugh should be permitted to take and hold his seat in the House of Commons to which he is justly entitled. These resolutions were seconded and spoken upon by the two other officials occupying the platform, when they were enthusiastically carried by the meeting. The second resolution with reference to Mr. Bradlaugh was passed with a dissenting vote, the vote being taken by the holding up of hands; but one hand was raised in opposition to his taking his seat.

Mr. Bradlaugh then rose and for half an hour poured forth in a full, heavy voice a flood of eloquence not often listened to. He is one of the best open-air speakers I ever listened to. Of course the burden of his remarks pertained to the rights and obligations of working men. He urged them to not only keep up their organization, but to increase its efficiency by increasing its numbers and intelligently promoting its objects. He said the condition of the working men of England could never be what it should be so long as it is impossible for them to own homes of their own, and while one man could be the owner of a million acres, and millions of men could not own an acre. This sentiment was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, as well as much else he said. His hearers were fully in sympathy with him, and evinced the fullest approbation of his remarks. He said it would not be becoming for him to reply at length to the second resolution, but he gave them the assurance that he should contend with his best ability for the right to represent the constituency which had sent him to the House, and in any event he could only promise them that he should strive to perform his duty.

This was the first speech Mr. Bradlaugh has made since the injury was done him by the minions of the conservatives, and he found his strength hardly as great as he had supposed, and on this ground he begged indulgence for not continuing his remarks, which was earnestly requested. He was kind enough to allude to myself, the part of the world I am from, and the free institutions of America.

Mr. Bradlaugh left as soon as he had made his speech, and made his way back to the station in order to take the evening train for London. I remained over to see more of the people and the industries of this portion of England. He left me in charge of kind friends, to show me through the potteries, etc. I will remark that he had given me to understand that he did not expect this meeting would be so large as many that he has addressed, as he had never spoken before that organization nor at that locality. The society is much smaller than many others of the trades unions of the country. When he has spoken before the miners of Durham, in the vicinity of Newcastle, as many as twenty thousand have turned out to hear him; and in Manchester, Northampton, and many other places the people assembled in great numbers to listen to him. The meeting at Trafalgar Square in this city, which he addressed over a month ago, was estimated to number over forty thousand. There is scarcely a man in England capable of drawing out larger audiences. The numbers of his adherents are great, and steadily increasing. He is building up a party which must ultimately have a marked effect upon the affairs of this country.

I remained upon the ground some time watching the assembled multitudes in their enjoyments, some dancing on the floor, some playing lawn tennis, some bowling, and many listening to performers, singers, etc., who had been secured for the occasion. Various games were in operation, such as tossing balls at cocoanuts perched on wire stakes seventy-five feet distant, at a penny a toss, winning the cocoanut if hit or thrown from its perch; some striking with a heavy maul or beetle upon a lever or a spring, by which a ball is thrown upon a scale, indicating the force with which the blow is given. Some blows caused the ball to rise as high as five, six, and eight hundred, and occasionally by a strong man a thousand was reached. When that was the case a little figure of a man popped out with a spring and looked down upon the man who gave the heavy blow. Other games of throwing and pitching were engaged in. Very creditable performances in sleight of hand, balancing, etc., were done. One man dressed in tights came out on a platform and kept five and six balls in the air, three to five plates, and four butcher knives, catching them by the handles and tossing them most skilfully. He also did several feats with a ball (probably rubber, six or eight inches in diameter), such as catching it with a small rod when thrown at him from a distance of ten or twelve feet, picking it up from the floor with the rod, and making it spin in the air, roll, etc. He also balanced knives, rods, a ladder, etc., on his chin and forehead; and while he balanced on his chin a rod, with a plate spinning on the top, with each hand he kept balls in the air, and plates in the same way. Among other things, he balanced on his chin a limber whip, with a stock and lash united in one, the whip resting on the double, or bow. A negro performer, or rather a white man representing a negro, performed very well many comicalities with his banjo and otherwise. The audience enjoyed these performances highly, and the whole seemed like a regular vanity fair. There were several side shows in tents, with gypsies telling fortunes, etc. The whole, in the evening, was supplemented with a good display of fireworks, until which time the music and dancing were kept up, with a free indulgence in refreshments, both solid and fluid, especially the latter. The numbers present were largely increased after the working hours were over, and the working men and women from the scores of potteries had an opportunity of leaving their work, which the various bosses were before unwilling to consent to. The performances were kept up till nearly ten o'clock, making a regular gala day for the work people. The weather, fortunately, was favorable.

I accompanied Mr. E. W. Sale back to Stoke, where he keeps a very excellent temperance house. He is also an uncompromising Radical, and has been in prison for two years for his Radical views; but he sternly maintained his principles, and is much honored by his numerous acquaintances. His house is an excellent place at which to stop, and I cheerfully recommend it to all friends visiting Stoke, on Trent.

Obituary.

Aby Burdick, wife of Lewis S. Burdick, departed this life Sept. 8, 1881, aged fifty five years.

Mrs. Burdick was born in Chittendon county, Vermont, but resided in Texas, Kalamazoo county, Mich., since her girlhood. She was a Spiritualist for thirty years, one of the most calm in her thought and expression, even temperament, ever kind and amiable and hospitable, beloved by all who were honored by her friendship. She was as near a perfect type of womanhood, I think, as ever walked this earth. She was one of the very few friends that took a philosophical view of my change of conviction from Spiritualism to Materialism, and who from my entrance into the lecture field gave me her counsel and encouragement, and through all the twenty-one years that hav sped by remained the same steadfast friend. If any one deserved immortality she should be entitled to endless happy existence. Neither hopes nor wishes can create life if nature has made no provision for it. Whether we are destined to liv forever is, with many of us, an unsolved mystery. Sentiment cannot prove it. Even the deepest love cannot prove it. In the presence of death Spiritualist, Christian, Materialist alike are made one in sympathy; one in the consciousness that death levels all; one in sorrow over the parting that no vision can make a separation only in seeming.

As my friend Burdick (himself a Spiritualist most of his life) writes me: "She may be happy in spirit life. I think she is. I know she is if any one is; but I do not see her. She is gone, gone, no dream, no illusion. It is a fact, and everything I see reminds me that it is all too true. Her release from pain is all the silver lining there is to the terrible cloud that hangs over us. She passed out without a struggle, although she had suffered greatly.

"She frequently remarked that she was a Liberal Spiritualist. She believed in spirit communion, but did not indorse much that others did.

"A medium said to her on the camp-ground [Battle Creek, Mich.], 'You will not stay here long. You will soon pass over.' She, as well as myself, thought of it as we hav on other occasions as an idle fancy, but it proved all too true.

"I carried out her wish in the funeral arrangements, for she often said, 'Let me hav a Spiritual funeral, or none.'

"Some said they saw her at the funeral, passing from one room to another, and then stopping near Fitz and myself. If she took cognizance of the occasion, she, as well as myself, must hav been gratified by the large concourse of people gathered to pay their respects to the departed. When I think of all this, as well as the sorrowing hearts and willing hands to aid us during her sickness, the charge of total depravity against the human family seems more odious than ever. Sure, there is more nativ goodness in humanity than it gets credit for.

"Charles A. Andruss, Flushing, Mich., was the speaker; Julia and Jordan Athens, singers. More than one thousand people in attendance."

There is certainly an absence of gloom about a Spiritualist funeral, which characterizes most Christian ceremonies. W. F. JAMIESON.

God and the Devil.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In St. Johns, the little town in which I liv, there are six saloons, and also there are six churches. Six institutions of the devil and six institutions of God. One deals in doses of damnation for this world, and the other in doses of damnation for the next world. There is one thing that can be said in favor of the saloons. They so manage their business as to be able and willing to be taxed on their business, which fact goes to show that the devil as a business manager is far ahead of God, who is neither able nor willing to pay even one cent of tax on his places of business.

Notwithstanding God is exempt from taxation, two or three of his places of business are without a business manager for the want of funds. And were it not for the system of begging, begging, and begging, the others soon would be in the same fix.

The devil does a big business in St. Johns; besides he has a host of friends all over the country. The Seymour Times expresses itself as follows:

"Every brave man must admire the devil. Did anybody ever hear him complain? He takes blows without a murmur. Half a million soul-savers, great and small, assail him every day. He makes no reply, but quietly fights the whole kit of 'em. According to their own story he is always on top. With God and Jesus and the ghost and the virgin thrown in for good measure he still whales the whole lot. And he makes no fuss about it, whilst they keep up a continual tooting of horns, sounding of gongs, ringing of bells, and loud bellowing, making more to-do than fighting tom cats upon a million moonlit sheds."

Perhaps Bro. Monroe gets a little too enthusiastic when speaking of his old friend the devil. For if the Bible is true the devil sometimes makes a mistake. I never quite liked his running a drove of hogs into the sea—it was a little tough on the pigs and awful mean on the owner. But the devil has this consolation, he only drowned two thousand hogs, whilst God is charged with having drowned millions of human beings.

Sometimes when a man gets a big dose at the saloon he will begin to holler and yell, and say that he feels good. And occasionally he will fall down and become unconscious as to the things of this world. And it is just so at the church and especially at the Free Methodist church. When one gets full he says that he feels good. He hollers and yells, falls down, and soon becomes unconscious as to the things of this world. One is drunk on an overdose of whisky, and the other is drunk on an overdose of superstition. Both are objects of pity. Both got a little too full.

God could stop the traffic in whisky and close all of the saloons if he wanted to. And his friends hav asked him to do it a million of times, but God thinks he knows best, so he lets them flourish and keep right on. And why don't he close the saloons? Well, as we hav shown, God is a very bad business manager. And also he must be a friend of whisky. For in the Bible he recommends wine for the stomach's sake, and says, "Thou shalt bestow thy money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink" [that's whisky] (Deut. xiv, 26).

We will admit that saloons hav caused a vast amount of misery, and it is also true that the church has caused more misery to the world than hav saloons. The devil to-day has a better record than God, and the saloon is a better friend to man than the Bible, which consigns an honest man to a place of eternal torment on account of his honest opinion.

The church in the name of God has ripped men and women open with ripping-knives, tortured millions of good men and women with godly instruments of torture, torn out their tongues by the roots, cut off their ears, punched out their eyes with godly red-hot irons, hung them up by the heels with their heads downward, and killed them by setting dogs on them. And as a means of establishing the church in the name of God and their religion they burned at the stake and killed in various ways millions of human beings, and God approved of the work by looking on and refusing to help the poor, pitiable creatures who in vain were begging of him and of man for help and for mercy.

Did the saloon with the devil's help ever commit such acts? Who ever heard of a saloon man who killed men for saying or thinking that his whisky was not as good as some other man's whisky? The church has killed thousands of men and women for thinking that its religion was not as good as the religion of some other church. I never was drunk, but would rather be drunk on an overdose of whisky than be drunk on an over-dose of superstition.

It might be interesting to note the result if God and the devil would exchange pulpits. Let the devil run the church, and as an experiment let God run the saloon, and run it according to the following Bible command:

"Therefore thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; drink ye and be drunken, and spew, and fall, and rise no more" (Jer. xxv, 27); and in the next verse he says, "If they refuse to take the cup at thy hand to drink, then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, ye shall certainly drink." According to this, if God should undertake to run a saloon he would hav his customers all drunk and spewing all over town. Let us hope that God will still stick to the church and not undertake to run any of the institutions of the devil.

We are told that God will save a fellow from fire in the next world. But men on a burning ship most need a God who will save them from fire in this world. We want more gods, so that they can giv more attention to the things of this world. Our President for a long time has been very much in need of the services of a God. But owing to the great press of business on hand God has been obliged to let the doctors manage the case. There is no doubt but God is doing all he can, but there is too much business for one god; in fact, there is business enough in this world to keep a dozen gods busy if we only had the gods and they would all pitch in and do a good act whenever they see an opportunity without waiting to be called upon. Judge Black's Reply to Col. Ingersoll.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Some time since a friend said to me, "Hav you read Judge Black's reply to Colonel Ingersoll in the August number of the North American Review?" I replied: "I hav not, but am glad to hear that Judge Black has entered the field. He is an able man, and from a gun of his caliber we must expect some heavy shot."

As soon as I could procure a copy of the Review I did so, and read Ingersoll's article and Black's reply, and was astonished beyond measure. Instead of a learned, able, and candid reply to Col. Ingersoll's points, such as we were justified in expecting from one of Judge Black's high reputation as a debater and jurist, we hav a harang that would disgrace a third-rate pettifogger in a police court, and that might hav emanated from a callow Methodist licentiate, more intent on giving God the glory than telling the truth.

Instead of being an "argumentum ad judicium," it is an argumentum ad hominem. He refers to Col. Ingersoll one hundred and eighty-six times, and to his questions as seldom as possible.

The twelve labors of Hercules would be light compared to the task of reviewing all the stale platitudes, glaring absurdities, and downright perversions of history that this remarkable "reply" contains, but I cannot refrain from noticing a few of them.

1. "An offense against public decency."

The superlativ arrogance of this remark proves Judge Black to be fully imbued with the spirit of modern Christianity.

2. "It is not true that a profound change has taken place in the world of thought."

Can it be possible that Judge Black is ignorant of the facts? Does he wish us to understand that he never read Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, Haeckel, or Helmholtz? Did he never see a copy of the Popular Science Monthly? Does he wish to impress the idea upon us that he belongs to the Silurian period, and is only sojourning temporarily amongst us? If he has not been asleep for the last fifty years what evidence hav we that he has been awake?

3. "The bad classes of society always hated the the doctrin and disciplin which reproached their wickedness and frightened them by threats of punishment in another world."

That is right, judge! When you can't answer a man's arguments, attribute his opinions to the innate depravity of his heart, and impugn his motivs in expressing those opinions. That is a truly Christian method.

4. "These are what Paul refers to as 'vain bablings,' and the opposition of science, falsely so called, but they are perfectly powerless to stop or turn aside the great current of human thought on the subject of Christian theology."

Excuse us, judge. We are not trying to stop it. Let it roll. The more thought the less theology.

5. "It would be a mere waste of time and space to enumerate the proofs which show that the universe was created by a preëxistent and self-conscious being, of power and wisdom, to us inconceivable."

The learned judge could not be better employed. We poor Infidels would be very thankful for one single proof of that "stupendous miracle," and would look with much less suspicion on the lesser miracles said to hav been performed at a later day.

6. "The moral code of the Bible consists in certain immutable rules to govern all men at all times in all places. It is entirely separate and apart from the civil polity . . . of the Jewish people."

Indeed! If one is for "all time and all men," why was not the other? Were not the Jews men and women? and if Jehovah's "civil polity" was good for them was it not equally good for the Gentiles? and if not, why not? If the command recorded in Genesis xiii, 6–10, was ever given by Jehovah it would prove him an infinit fiend instead of a merciful God.

7. "His language is recklessly bad, very defectiv in method, and altogether lacking in precision." Nobody will dispute with Judge Black the honor of making that discovery.

8. "Then for him there is no standard at all; one thing is as right as another, and all things are equally wrong."

This is sheer misrepresentation, if not something worse. Atheists do hav a standard of morality. It is humanity, something that they are acquainted with, and know something about. They don't profess to know anything about Jehovah, or what he has commanded or forbidden. What does Judge Black know about God?

9. "I appeal from his profane malediction to the conscience of men who hav a rule to judge by." Pope Leo XIII. for instance. "Protestantism of every form has not, and never can hav, any rights when Catholicity is triumphant" (Catholic Review for January, 1852).

10. "These are crimes which every independent community has always punished with the utmost rigor. In our own recent history they were repressed at the cost of more lives than Judea ever contained at any one time."

Here things totally different are confounded. Blasphemy and idolatry are not, and by no stretch of the imagination can be made, treason. Neither is there any analogy between the "war for the union" and the Jewish war of conquest and extermination. The one was to suppress rebellion against legally-constituted authority; the other was an invasion by foreigners.

11. "My faith and my reason both assure me that the infallible God proceeded upon good grounds when he authorized slavery in Judea. Subordination of inferiors to superiors is the groundwork of human society."

The logic of events seems to hav produced no effect upon the judge's views of slavery, either in the abstract or concrete, and his reasoning here sounds very like a wail for "the lost cause." Verily the Bourbons are not all dead yet.

12. "Either the evidence by which the apostles were able to prove the supernatural origin of the gospels was overwhelming and irresistible, or else its propagation was provided for and carried on by the direct aid of the divine being himself."

These considerations, if they prove anything, prove too much. The same train of argument would prove the divinity of Buddhism and Mohammedanism.

13. "Mr. Ingersoll speaks of interpolations made by the fathers of the church. All he knows, and all he has ever heard on the subject, is that some of the innumerable transcripts contained errors which were discovered and corrected. That simply proves the present integrity of the documents" (Black).

"The Christian world is left in uncertainty as to what its scriptures are as long as the sacred text is so full of various readings. There is hardly a sentence in the whole of the four gospels in which there are not varieties of diction in our principle manuscripts, baffling all our attempts to decide which was its original form" (Dean Alford, Critical Introduction to the Greek Text of the New Testament).

"Among the numberless translations which are extant this day in Europe, there is none of them all which is of divine and infallible authority" (Preface to King James's Bible, London).

"But this is a false assumption, not countenanced or even suggested by anything contained in the scriptures." Let us see.

"For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter i, 21).

"The spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue" (2 Samuel xxiii, 2).

See also 2 Tim. iii, 16; Luke i, 70; Acts iii, 18, and i, 16.

15. "No such doctrin [as salvation through faith alone] is propounded in the scriptures, or in the creed of any Christian church."

"And by him all that believe are justified from all things" (Acts xiii, 39; also Romans iii, 28).

"For by grace are ye saved, through faith, and that not of yourselvs; it is the gift of God" Eph. ii, 8; also Gal. ii, 16, with various other texts teaching the same doctrin. See Rom. xi, 6, and 2 Tim. i, 9).

16. "The mere failure to believe it is punished in hell! I hav never known any Christian man or woman to assert this" (Black).

"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Old version, Mark xvi, 16; see John iii, 18, and Acts xvi, 31).

17. "And this exemption extends to adults who hav never seen the evidence." Then of what use are missionaries?

18. "The broadest benevolence, universal philanthropy, inexhaustible charity, are inculcated in every line of the New Testament. It is plain Mr. Ingersoll never read a chapter of it."

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword" (Matt. x, 34, 35, 36, and 37; also verses 15 and 21; also chap. xi, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24).

"I am come to send fire on earth" (Luke xii, 49; also 51, 53). "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and wife and children, and brethren and sisters, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). "But mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them bring hither and slay before me" (Luke xix, 27). "And he that hath no sword let him sell his garment and buy one" (Luke xxii, 36, and Rev. ii, 23).

By an examination of the texts above cited it will appear what dependence can be placed on Judge Black's assertions when he attempts to play the role of a theological David.

If the argumentum ad verecundiam were not entirely inapplicable to his case, I might suggest that he take a little of the medicin he so gratuitously offers to Col. Ingersoll.

19. "It is true that some persons professing Christianity hav violated the fundamental principles of their faith by inflicting violent injuries and bloody wrongs upon their fellow-men," etc. Then by parity of reasoning Mohammedanism is equally innocent.

20. "The kingdom of Christ is based upon certain principles to which it requires the assent of every one who would enter therein."

"Religious liberty in the sense of a liberty possessed by every man to choose his own religion is one of the most wicked delusions ever foisted upon this age by the father of deceit. The very name of liberty ought to be banished from the domain of religion" (Shepherd of the Valley—Catholic).

This givs a fair idea of Catholic "freedom of thought," and Protestantism is but a diluted form of Catholicism.

2. "Are miracles impossible? No one will say so who opens his eyes to the miracles of creation with which we are surrounded."

Here is apparently an intentional misstatement of the case. Webster defines a miracle to be "an event or effect contrary to the established constitution and course of things, or a deviation from the known laws of nature." But what Judge Black calls "the miracles of creation with which we are surrounded" are in strict conformity to the known laws of nature. It is only an event which takes place in direct violation of those laws that is entitled to the name of a miracle; and such an event, instead of establishing or substantiating any religion, is itself the very thing that most needs substantiating. Hume said, "It is more probable that human testimony should be false than that a miracle should be true;" and Carpenter and Tyndall say a break in the uniformity and continuity of nature's laws has never yet been discovered.

Judge Black forgets that the onus probandi of the miracle of original creation rests with those who assert it.

22. "This religion has come down to us through the ages, attended all the way by righteousness, justice, temperance, mercy, transparent truthfulness, exulting hope, and white-winged charity."

Judge Black's acquaintance with Mosheim, Hallam, Buckle, and Lecky appears to be as limited as his knowledge of the Bible. This inference is unavoidable if we charitably giv him credit for a willingness to tell the truth; but this, in view of his many extraordinary statements, we find it difficult to do.

The conclusion is, if Judge Black is really ignorant of the present status of the "conflict between religion and science," we pity him, and in that case he should not attempt to champion Christianity. But if he has lifted his eyes from his law books long enough to notice what is going on around him, what shall we say of his honesty? In either case his position is an unenviable one. His laurels, justly won in his own chosen field, hav been sadly tarnished by his unwise attempt to enter the arena of theological polemics and poise a lance in defense of "an absurd superstition, propagated by impostors, professed by hypocrits, and believed only by credulous dupes." Instead of answering Col. Ingersoll, he has only succeeded in disappointing those who "put their trust in princes," and disgusting those who do not.

History of the Christian Religion to A.D. 200.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just finished reading Judge Waite's "History of the Christian Religion to A.D. 200," and I hav no hesitancy in saying that it is one of the most timely, scholarly, and remarkable productions of the age. A book of such rare merit should be in every house and read by every thinking man and woman. It is the fullest and most perfect account of the Christian religion during its very earliest period that has ever been placed before the people, and impresses the reader at once with its truth and validity. It is written in a clear, straightforward manner, depicting facts and dates exactly as they are; and, as we read, the gospels, miracles, miracle-workers, apostolic fathers, Christian writers, the trinity, atonement, original sin, etc., with all the stock in trade belonging to the Christian religion, assume new and startling shapes, while dreams, myths, and fancies are seen to crumble and fade before the light held before them by this candid author.

A thorough and extensiv criticism of this valuable work would occupy too much space in your columns, but suffice it to say the "History of the Christian Religion to A.D. 200" is a book that the student, the investigator, the thinker, the searcher after truth will find invaluable, and one that he cannot afford to do without; and I trust the talented author may, in the sale and diffusion of his work, be amply repaid for all the toil, time, and trouble required to place before the public this highly interesting and important work. What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO 53.

583. Habakkuk, with three other chapters of fifty-six verses, comes next in order. There is a slight discrepancy as to the time whon he lived and wrote, but as that is by no means an unusual occurrence it need not excite surprise. His invectives were chiefly directed against the Chaldeans, the oppressors of the Jews. Their value to us amounts to very little.

584. Zephaniah also treats us with three short chapters containing fifty-three verses, supposed to have been written about 530 B. C. The burden of his fears was from the Scythians, and that they would destroy his people. The destruction came, but not from the source his fears indicated. He cannot be regarded as a true prophet.

585. Haggai treats us simply to two chapters of thirty-eight verses. He wrote after the captivity, and when the rebuilding of the temple had commenced. Chadwick says of him: "His spirit is less moral than ecclesiastical. He is one of the least inspired of all the prophets, one of the most prosaic." If, then, the prophets are to be likened to a measure of tubers, Haggai will have to be set down as a small potato.

586. Zechariah comes with somewhat greater pretensions, but he claims too much, or rather, too much is claimed for him. Of the sixteen chapters accredited to him he is really entitled to but half of them. These he wrote during the rebuilding of the temple, which was the burden of his song. The other eight chapters were by some unknown author, and were written a century earlier. This is but another instance of the dishonesty or carelessness attendant upon the compiling and fixing up God's word for him. It cannot be claimed that Zechariah amounts to very much.

587. Malachi, with four short chapters, closes the prophets and completes the Old Testament canon. By the marginal notes in the Bible it is claimed to have been written about 397 B. C., but critics insist that this estimate is at least half a century out of the way. That, however, is a matter not at all material to us. We will give or take fifty years without a murmur. Chadwick has this to say of this final prophet: "It is uncertain whether Malachi is a prophet's name, or his title. It means the angel, or messenger, of Yahweh. There is no contemporary mention of any such prophet. He has not the old-time inspiration. The Jews considered him the last of the prophets. Apparently his prophecies were never spoken. He is significant as the first prophet who makes any mention of the Mosaic law," probably for the very good reason that the Mosaic law was unknown to the Jews until within a few hundred years of our era. Had the Mosaic law been in existence fifteen centuries before the Christian era, and had it been of such consequence as has since been claimed for it, it is very singular that none of the prophets, save this very questionable Malachi, had not a word to say about it. I do not believe that Moses ever wrote a law, I do not believe that David wrote the book of Psalms, that Solomon wrote the Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, or that the prophets we have been considering required any help from the infinite creator of the universe to enable them to write the very imperfect books ascribed to them.

588. I cannot believe that a tithe of the importance attached by Christians to the Jewish prophets really belongs to them, or that they possessed superior power in knowing and revealing the mind and purposes of the most high creator and governor of the universe. They clearly exhibit the bias of the religious superstitions under which they were reared, and show the fact that they were not a class of men superior to hundreds, thousands, and millions that have lived in various ages of the world.

589. It does not appear that the Jewish prophets were of signal importance, even at the time they flourished. If they even had a presentiment of the evils that were to befall their people, they had not the power to prevent it, for the evils came, and all were swept away together. With such a number to speak and write for him, it would seem that Jehovah, or Yahweh, should have been better able to make himself understood, and should have been able to introduce such measures among his people as to prevent the dire calamities that befell and destroyed the people of his choice.

590. It cannot, in any truth, be accorded to the Jewish nation that they were the originators of prophecy, nor that many other nations had not used it before they had an existence. The ancient Hindoos had their prophets and holy men; so had the ancient Persians; and their great prophet and teacher, Zoroaster, towers far above all the prophets and teachers of which the Jewish people can boast. The Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the Canaanites also all had their prophets; and it would not be extravagant to imagine that they foretold future events with about as much accuracy as their followers of the Jewish people. Had their prognostications been handed down to us as have been the writings of the Jews, it is not at all improbable that we would have found in them quite as much that might be considered remarkable—quite as much that might be regarded as divine or superhuman.

591. If it even be admitted that several of the Jewish prophets, as their names have been handed down to us, had an actual existence, and that they spoke and wrote that which might be called prophecy (the foretelling of events that were to take place at some future period), full reliance cannot be placed on the record that has been handed down to us. We have only to remember that the more important of the prophecies were written before the Babylonish captivity; and that when Nebuchadnezzar and his Chaldean army took the Jewish people captive and carried them off to their own country and city, Babylon, the Jewish temple was not only destroyed, but their sacred writings which were kept therein, including, of course, the writings of their prophets; and there is no account that their writings were ever reproduced until after the return from captivity, when, according to the book of Esdras, in the Apocrypha, five rapid scribes were selected, who wrote continuously for forty days, and in that time produced, or reproduced, two hundred and four books. In this very convenient way the destroyed books could have been reproduced, prophecies and all; but it is to be feared that they might not all have been strictly correct. It is to be feared that when they waxed weary, and the spirit which ministered unto them might have lessened his energy, there might have been some deficiency in the divine afflatus thus imparted, and the divinity of the productions thus vouchsafed, consequently more or less imperfect. When the writings, which originally were not perfect, were destroyed, it is to be feared that reproducing them by such a process, or any other, could not be regarded as strictly reliable.

592. While it may be considered a well-settled fact that bu a small portion of the books of the Old Testament were written by the persons to whom they are attributed, and that but few of them were written at the early period in which they have been generally supposed to have been produced, another fact stands prominently forth, and that is that Moses and the Mosaic law were greatly or entirely unknown to the Jewish people. No law of Moses was known to Samuel, David, Solomon, or any of the later kings. The last prophet of all—and he a very apocryphal one—seems to have made the slightest mention of the Mosaic law.

593. It is very reasonable to conclude that the early history of the Jews is involved in great doubt and uncertainty. At the best, the whole story is extremely mythical and fabulous. If none of the prophets, none of the kiugs, and none of the people knew anything of Moses and his law, it is extremely probable that all the early part of the Jewish story is involved in the same mythical doubt and uncertainty, including Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the rest of those old worthies, or unworthies, as the case may be. It is claimed that while the Jewish people were held in captivity in Babylon they acquired more learning and general information than they had ever possessed before, having previous to that time been a nomadic and semi-wild race of people. After returning from their captivity, however, they felt the need of a national history and a national religion, when the books comprising the Old Testament were produced. Whether this is true or not, I do not believe, and for the reasons given, the books comprising the Old Testament were written by the names accorded to them, nor at the times when they are claimed to have been written.

594. I do not believe what is called the Jewish cosmogony—the account of the creation of the world—was original with the Jewish people. It is well known that the Chaldeans taught a system of cosmogony very similar in its character, and the same was inscribed upon their earthen tablets long prior to the time when the Jews were held captive in their city, and long before it is known that the Pentateuch was written. Smith and Rawlinson, in their excavations at Babylon and Nineveh, found large numbers of these ancient tablets, and learned to decipher the cuneiform inscriptions upon them, and among other curious matter traced the story of the creation of the world, inscribed on those tablets some four thousand years ago, and from which legendary source there is little doubt the Jews borrowed their notions, and which were later written out in their own language and claimed as an inspiration from their own God. Those tablets were taken to London and deposited in the British Museum, and I have had the pleasure of examining them. I do not believe that the Jewish story of the creation of the world was written or heard of until long, long after those Chaldean tablets were inscribed.

595. I cannot give credence to the story that Hilkiah the priest told to King Josiah that he had found a book of the law of the Lord in the house of the Lord, and that this was the law of Moses which had long been lost. It is far more likely to have been a priestly trick to cover a new invention, and caused to be received with reverence and eclat a new production which the priest wished to palm off as a new revelation from heaven. It is extremely improbable that a book so important as God's law could have remained in the temple from the time that Solomon built until the time of King Josiah, and nobody have ever known anything about it. It is far more probable that it was produced by Hilkiah the priest and Shaphon, his scribe, and that they wished to have it accepted as the word of God. The readiness with which King Josiah accepted the book claimed to have been so singularly found can easily be accounted for upon the ground of his youth and inexperience; or it might be quite possible that he was privy to the game being played, and the smiting of his knees may easily have been simulated to make the game go off well. But however much importance is attached to the book which Hilkiah claimed to find, there is no proof that it survived the destruction of Nebuchadnezzar, and, whatever its original value, it had to be reproduced.

Letters from Friends.

MANSFIELD CENTER, CONN., Sept. 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find check for $10. I intend to keep on the right side of D. M. B., and help him with all my might, as I would rather hav his good will than that of the best Presbyterian God in the universe. The $10 is to help support THE TRUTH SEEKER. Long may it liv and all those connected with it.

Ever yours with respect, J. S. MACFARLAND.

[return our heartfelt thanks to friend Macfarland. His kindness is of a substantial kind that Liberal editors know well how to appreciate. May his shadow never be less nor his pocket leaner for his generosity.—ED. T. S.]

DEL NORTE, COL., Sept. 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Another at the eleventh hour for the Round-the-World fund. Inclosed please find money order for $10—$5 for the books of travel, $3 for subscription to the best Liberal journal, and $2 worth of TRUTH SEEKERS for my brother in Europe, commencing with Mr. Bennett'e first letter. I hope Mr Bennett won't forget to bring along with him a basketful of those wonderful Jericho roses, which only blossom Christmas eve, as the church has it. Please forward one or two of them to me by mail so I can experiment on them Christmas.

P. S.—I should consider this a grand speculation for Mr. Bennett if he only made the hundred thousandth part of what the Catholic church has made by this deceiving humbug. Yours truly,

FRANK IHRINGER.

FALL RIVER, MASS., Sept. 26, 1881.

R. EDITOR: I inclose my check of $7.50—$5 to become a member of the Round-the-World Co., and 50 cents for likenesses each of D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll (lithograph), and $1.50 if you will be kind enough to hand to Mrs. S. B. Chase for the Physiologist, and oblige Yours, LEMUEL HALL.

LOOKINGGLASS, OR., Sept. 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think I will be able to spare the money for your new book by the time the first edition is out. Will also try and get some new subscribers for you when threshing is over. There are a good many Liberal-minded men in this far-off community, many who are well-to-do in the world, yet show too much indifference to a cause they believe to be right. This is not as it should be. But let us only be patient, the old superstitions of the past will hav to giv way by littles, and the public mind eventually outgrow them entirely.

Yours respectfully, F. WARD.

OPEN LETTER TO MR. STEPHEN YOUNG.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Sept. 5, 1881.

Your letter of the 28th ult. is received, in which you narrate, as positiv evidence of a future existence, incidents most marvelous that transpired at different times in your intercourse with Spiritualists, and ask me to embrace that belief.

I am very liberal in my views, always respecting the honest opinions of others, though they may be at variance with my own, yet I must plead guilty to a strong prejudice against Spiritualism, not perhaps so much against its doctrins as against the proceedings attending its demonstration—its cabinets, curtains, partitions, private rooms, etc., and its exhibitions being conducted in dimly-lighted rooms. These apparently necessary associations in themselvs would hav a tendency to convince me that somewhere in its operations there exists a sham which, through their assistance or presence, was concealed from the outside view. To a believer it may all appear conclusiv proof of spiritual manifestations, but to me it resembles more the wonderful and unaccountable feats of Prof. Anderson, Signor Blitz, and other sleight-of-hand performers in the art of necromancy, which I hav frequently witnessed, and mark the similarity: they, like the Spiritualist, must hav the necessary appliances or the performance cannot go on, showing most conclusivly that beneath all these preparations for the occasion there exists almost undeniable proofs of its false teachings.

If the truths of Spiritualism are such as you would fain hav me to believe them to be, why resort to all this preparation in order to demonstrate that which should be common to the whole human family? Why should your system, like the Christian religion, demand that a chosen few be set apart or delegated to explain to others that which should be a supreme right belonging alike to all the children of men that hav friends in that spirit-land? Is not the dear departed as tenderly attached to its earthly friend as it was when clothed in mortal form? And, if so, why should they not be permitted to communicate at all times and places with their friends without the assistance or through the medium of strangers?

If you hav a something here which is what you claim it is, why not publish and proclaim it to the whole world in the broad glare of day, perform it upon the street corners, in the public square, in the broad fields, and court investigation, that all may learn this wondrous truth and be enabled to hold communion with those that hav gone before?

If you are sincere in your endeavor to convert me and others to the faith I will offer to any person the opportunity of proving to me the truthfulness of the theory you advocate upon these conditions: that we proceed to the top of one of the highest mountain peaks near by, and there, in open daylight, without any preparation, and in the presence of all that may be there congregated, perform the usual spiritual operations successfully, with like results as when performed in the usual manner and with the usual preparations, then will I believe that there is something more than jugglery behind these scenes, and you will hav proved your claim of immortality. You know that you cannot comply with these conditions, hence your theory must be false and unworthy the attention of intelligent and reasoning minds.

You say: "According to our family record, my parents lost a son before my birth at the age of about a year. His given name was Gorham (an unusual name). It was very seldom that I ever thought of this brother, and at the second or third seance, while I was not thinking of him, the curtain was drawn aside and a face presented which I did no recognize; and while I was wondering who it could be, and before I spoke, he said, in a distinct whisper, 'I am your brother Gorham, who died before you were born.'"

According to your belief, are the spirits immortal? Do they change, grow, after giving up their mortal tenement of clay? If they do not grow older, how do you account for the fact that a child, unable to talk, should speak to you in good plain English, recognize you, whom it had never seen before, and, I suppose, presented the face of a grown person? If the face was no that of a child, it would go to show most conclusivly that the spirits grow; and, if so, they being immortal, there could be no power to prevent them from growing on forever. If they grow at all there, they must grow forever. If the spirits do not grow, and you saw the face of a grown person instead of a child, does it not strike you as somewhat peculiar? Take it which ever way you please, it looks very much like human trickery, legerdemain, or whatever name you may see fit to apply, but not in any manner attributable to the spirits of departed humanity. D. D. LAKE.

CENTRAL, S. C., Sept. 20, 1881.

DEAR MACDONALD: The posters you sent me arrived in due time, but I am sorry to say I hav only found one place in this self-righteous and Christian town where I was suffered to put one up. The pious postmaster here refused them a place in the post-office, notwithstanding the walls are literally covered with other newspaper posters, etc.; but then, you know, these are all indorsed by Mrs. Grundy.

There are two or three soft-shelled, or rather whitewashed, Liberals in the place, but they are such moral cowards that they will not suffer anything hetrodox to be seen on their walls, for fear of offending the pious humbugs of Israel.

There is one young merchant in the town who allowed me to hang up one of the show-bills in his store; and there is another one on a nice board in the street just in front of my humble domicil, and I will hav the others somewhere if it creates a revolution in Abraham's bosom worse than the one when Lucifer was forced to emigrate and go into the brimstone traffic.

Well, the deluded bigots may, to some extent, destroy Liberal literature; they can burn a few Freethought journals, but the reign of reason and the triumph of truth is only a question of time.

Fraternally thine, R. M. CASEY.

CARVERSVILLE, PA., Sept. 25, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: Having been beating about the bush of Freethought (destined to grow a mighty tree), I hav been waiting to see what I now see in H. L. Green's communication in your issue of the 24th inst.—the fire that burns without consuming the bush, which meets my entire approbation.

I hold for all to hav their say
And do their work in their own way
Without regard to creeds of men,
In spoken words or writ with pen.
Then the fire will not consume
Freedom's bush for want of room;
And free-born souls put off their shoes*
And hail with joy the glorious news,
And sound the jubilee abroad.
Science, knowledge, is our god.

* Put off the shoes of prejudice,
That keep the mind in awe,
And rally to the standard
Of universal law.

Respectfully, E. W. ALLEN.

ST. JOSEPH, MICH., Aug. 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I want to pay you for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for that reason I send you $2. I hav got another subscriber. I trust friend Bennett will hav a prosperous and pleasant journey. Respects to Mr. Eugene Macdonald and Mrs. Bennett.

JAMES S. BEDELL.

JAMESPORT, MO., Sept. 4, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find one dollar, for which please send me your paper. I am glad to see that our grand hero, Mr. Bennett, has arrived sound and well on the opposit shore of the Atlantic. Success to the paper during his absence is my wish. If you will send me several of those posters I will post them conspicuously.

W. D. SHULER.

ALBANY, N. Y., Sept. 9, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I hasten to send you word to put me down as a regular subscriber as soon as you can. If it had not been on account of sickness you would not hav had a chance to tell me that my time as a trial-subscriber had expired. You ask if we like the paper. Of course we do; it is a light in the darkness, a city on a hill that can't be hid; we cannot do without it. My husband says, "Hurry up, get the letter ready." I sent the order down. I don't like to miss a copy; it should be in every family, and superstition would soon disappear.

When I am well again I will do something in the direction of getting subscribers, and if you will send a poster I may be able to make use of it. I hav been troubled with rheumatism of late, and don't walk further than I am obliged to.

Yesterday was a very solemn day in Albany, fasting and prayer in many of the churches. One pastor took the text, "Whatsoever you ask the Father in my name he will do," and they all went to praying with a will. The result is not yet made public, but the promis stands sure. The paper with the account of the churches contains the news of dozens of people out West who in the last few days were roasted alive by the large wood-fires out there. It seemed mighty strange that no prayers were offered to stay the blaze. If any human being had the power to heal the President and rescue the sufferers out West and refused to do so the Americans would not think much of him, but the Christian God, who is all powerful, can do as he pleases and is thanked and praised for refusing a reasonable request. They are satisfied to take the will for the deed. I would like to ask the ever-present help in time of trouble to do something in that direction. The President has suffered long enough for the sake of that lunatic Guiteau, and help is indeed welcome from one who is able to giv it. The morning Express called Guiteau a blasphemer because he said God inspired him. I wonder what its opinion is about Abraham.

I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will prosper and the books of travel will do a great deal in reducing the number of believers. Every truth seeker ought to send $5. Inclosed please find $3 for the paper, and 25 cents in addition to the $5, for illustrating the books. Excuse me for writing so tedious, but believe me to be your well-wisher,

MRS. N. A. WENINK-ILIOHAN.

FREDERICA, Sept. 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: The tab on THE TRUTH SEEKER admonishes me that there is three dollars wanted. I therefore inclose postal order for same. I am making some effort to get others to subscribe, and hope to succeed. Hope to increase the list of subscribers during Mr. Bennett's absence.

Yours fraternally, N. J. MOORE.

ARLINGTON, MASS., Sept. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing by the tab on my paper that the time has almost expired for a renewal of my subscription, I inclose the amount for another year. I also send fifty cents to pay for one lithograph likeness of Mr. Bennett.

My husband and I like the paper very much, and think we cannot do without it. We look forward most anxiously for its arrival, and we read it with great interest, especially Mr. Bennett's letters. Since I commenced reading THE TRUTH SEEKER I feel like a little child just learning the first rudiments of knowledge. I hope the light of science will grow brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.

Yours truly, LUCY A. CURRIER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 6, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: Another trial subscriber for you. Now if every one who feels any interest in our old friend's absence would just use a little exertion, he or she might add one or two more names to the company of truth seekers, which would cheer the heart of our old friend on his return to his nativ home, and would show him, though absent from us, he was not forgotten. Inclosed find shin-plasters for the same. Yours fraternally, W. F. PORTER.

RENO, NEV., Sept. 11, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find money order for one dollar for your valuable paper for four months. D. M. Bennett's reply to Mr. Mair's arguments is perfectly grand.

MRS. MARTHA J. YOUNGLOVE.

NEWPORT, ME., Sept. 27, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: Your editorial, "The Nation's Calamity," is good. All Liberals ought to feel thankful that the President was shot by a Christian. None but a knave or fool would charge his death to Infidelity. It all comes from the infamous teachings of the doctrin of a vicarious atonement.

Your friend, SEWARD MITCHELL.

DANSVILLE, MICH., Sept. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclose please find postal order for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year; I see by the tab on my paper that my time expired on the first day of this month. Mr. Bennett's letters are more than worth the cost of the paper for one year. So long liv the old TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper published in the English language.

Yours for mental liberty, E. J. SMITH.

GRATTAN, MICH., Sept. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The extract you publish from the speech of Mr. Dailey at the Hornellsville Convention, in your issue of Sept. 17th, is so good and appropriate in every respect that I am constrained to write a few words commendatory to you for publishing as well as to him for uttering it. It contains in a condensed form the best code of morals I ever read, and I wish every person who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER would not only read it again, but preserve it and call the attention of his family, his neighbors, and particularly his Christian friends, to its excellent precepts and sound morals that should be practiced by all. It is very necessary that Liberals should show "by their daily walk and conversation" that theirs is a better way than either or all that is taught and lived by any of the numerous religious sects. They hav to contend with all the difference of opinion caused by the business of every-day life the same as Liberals, and in addition they hav their contentions caused by sectarian dogmas, which are more bitter, more strenuously maintained and lasting, than all things pertaining to the every-day business of life. In this respect Liberals hav the advantage, and they should be careful to maintain and exercise it. The precepts of Mr. Dailey will do much good if we are only careful to remember and apply them every day.

Another important point to which Liberals should giv their best thoughts and continuous work is the "Social Aspect of Liberalism," alluded to by Mr. Courtlandt Palmer at Hornellsville. In that lies one great source of strength that is effectually used by the church in its control of the masses. A large portion of those who giv their countenance and pecuniary aid to church organizations think or care very little about religion aside from its social enjoyments. Men, women, and children attend church because it is popular to do so. They display their fine clothes, hav a social chat, a kind of holiday time, which is pleasant and profitable. Liberals must giv more time, talent, and money in this direction if they would succeed. We need organizations to promulgate our opinions and make them popular.

Liberals fail in obtaining the respect and confidence of the people at large because of their neglect to organize any proper system of conducting funeral exercises. This is a matter that sooner or later comes home to all of us; and on account of the neglect to provide beforehand for these occasions must people at such times go to the church and comply with its forms and ceremonies, even though in their belief they do not in the least coincide with any religious sect. In doing thus they giv their support and tacit assent to that which in every day life they often ridicule as inconsistent and not in accordance with reason and common sense. By doing thus they act the part of hypocrits, and the cause of Liberalism fails to command the respect it deserves.

Yours truly, C. CLOSE.

MOUNT VERNON, WASH. TER., Sept. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 in payment for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am in sympathy with the cause of Freethought, and believe that you are doing more for the good of mankind than all the priests in Christendom. Much credit is due you for the good you hav done, and I trust will continue to do, in banishing from the minds of the people the idea of a cruel and vindictiv God who takes the greatest pleasure in witnessing the cries and lamentations of the damned, and that unless we believe in Christ and the apostles a lake of everlasting fire and brimstone most surely awaits us. These are doctrins that it might do to teach in times past, but not in this age of enlightenment and civilization. Respectfully yours, H. CLOTHIER.

WHEELING, W. VA., Sept. 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for trial subscription to the blessed old TRUTH SEEKER, whose editor is now on a tour of investigation, whilst you, Mr. Macdonald, are keeping things level at home. You are superintending magnificently, and no Liberal should for a moment relax his or her energy in the noble work of mental freedom. The two subscribers are for three months. Hoping that the paper may come to hand promptly, I subscribe myself

Yours truly, J. O. BROSIUS.

GROTON, DAK. TER., Sept. 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $10—$5 for the trip around the world and $5 to pay up what I owe on the paper. Hoping tnat all who read this will follow suit, I remain, Yours truly, JAS. H. GILES.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Find inclosed $3 to apply on my subscription. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER the grandest paper in the world, and look forward every week to its coming with anxiety. In these stirring times, and while Mr. Bennett is away looking for the footprints of Jehovah, while the nation is wrung with the groans and filled with the blood of martyrs, it behooves us weaker ones to strike. And who will defend Guiteau on the grounds of religious fanaticism, as he exclaimed "God told" him to shoot? And Freeman was told to strike the deadly knife to the life-spring of his innocent little child; also Abraham was told by God to slay his own son, so Jephthah's God ordered or approved of the sacrificing of his daughter. Jehovah is not satisfied with anything short of blood (even his own son had to bleed and die to appease the wrath of a benign father). So those are Jehovah's footprints, and our friend Bennett need not hav gone from home to find them.

Now when the nation was filled with hope that the martyred President would survive, Jehovah passed through our fair land on the night of Monday, Sept. 19th, and as it is told in Exodus xii, 29, "Smote all the first-born in the land, from the first-born of Pharaoh who sat on throne to the first-born of the captiv in the dungeon" (Jehovah's footprints on the sands of time). It was surely all his work, for the book says, in Isaiah xlv, 7, "I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and create evil; I, the Lord, do all these things."

The assassin was a Christian, he says, so he was and has always been, and is only following out the injunction of bloody records. Now the Christians must turn round and hang him to vindicate what? the meekness of the lamb, who says, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay? Who will say it was anything but religious fanaticism that caused him to do the bloody work? Yours truly, L. N. BENNETT.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Bennett's letters are very entertaining, and you make the paper real good. I am always wishing for your uccess and that the grand qualities that make the pure, good, useful man may adorn your life and rest right royally upon you. Accept my kind regards, and giv my love to Mrs. Bennett. Yours truly, MRS. H. L. BUCHNER, M.D.

CINCINNATI, Sept. 27, 1881.

MR. MCDONALD: I suppose out of common courtesy you will not refuse to publish this letter, which is a mild but firm defense of my honest principles. From time immemorial the unbeliever in creeds, dogmas, and other phases of supernaturalism hath been abused, deceived, and treated in a manner utterly disgraceful to the boasted refinement of our "high civilization." No words seem coarse enough to be hurled at the unbeliever. The gentle idolater and the modern angel on earth would grind the impious Infidel to dust, or make a roast of him, if they dared. But this fearless Infidel, of the anti-supernatural stripe, will only laugh to scorn the ebullitions of pious malice. It is as harmless as a gentle patter of rain-drops on a well-roofed castle. But abuse is not argument. My argument is founded on the laws of nature, which convince me that in order to hav a spirit, mind, or soul (all the same thing) there must be a living, normal, organized brain, and as that brain is matter and has a beginning it will also hav an end, and such spirit could no more exist after death than it could prior to life. The mind or spirit of man is not an entity, distinct from matter; it is simply the effect, not the cause. Those who believe in life before gestation or after extinction are welcome to their opinions, but while I retain my senses I shall never share them. I hav nothing against individuals; it is systems I oppose, not from bigotry or conceit, but from reason, which ever guides me, and never fails me. I can generously excuse W. S. Logan, Esq., for his epithets. They are choice, and clearly denote the superior mind of my critic. But I quarrel not with any man or woman. I respect every sincere person, but I despise all hypocrits. I hav nothing more to say now or any other time, except that when I expire I never expect to become a spook. I am, dear sir, Yours, in the best of humor, T. WINTER.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Sept. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Would like back numbers containing first three chapters of "Alamontada." I had been in the habit of circulating my numbers, and by mistake allowed it to go out before perceiving the merits of that production, and now feel that I must hav it entire. We enjoy Mr. Bennett's letters, and feel that we could not afford to miss one of them. And, altogether, the dear old journal seems like a choice friend calling in upon us once a week, which I cannot do without, although at present I must remit so sparingly.

Fraternally yours, MRS. L. M. PLANCK.

[We cannot send back numbers containing "Alamontada," but it will be put in book form when completed, and we shall then take pleasure in supplying our friends.—ED. T. S.]

FAIRFIELD, PA., Sept. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Garfield's belief in Christianity, I am inclined to think, was the belief of a statesman—only a belief in its utility, not in its supernatural origin. Faith in prayer has certainly received a terrible blow. I advised my pious friends not to risk its reputation on the issue of the President's illness, but they would do it, and now where are they? The pious can't be too cautious in the public application of such tests. A. O. SCOTT.

ARROWSMITH, ILL., Sept. 21, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: It has been but a short time since I gathered honest courage enough to speak my real sentiments. I now breathe the pure air of liberty. A Methodist brother of long standing said to e recently: "Kirk, I thought you were a man of t o good sense to turn in with this Ingersoll element, the embodiment of all immorality." I could only reply that I did not enjoy the church, and that I allowed every one to believe as he chose to. But I find I hav no desire for eternal life beyond the grave. I hav no taste for a luxurious, idle eternity. If there possibly be such a place as an orthodox heaven there will be no suffering humanity there to need my aid, and I hav little or no desire to be where I am of no use. I can see no practical benefit in a future existence. I hav committed to mother earth my fair-eyed and bright-eyed little boy, our first-born, and if nature can take care of him until I die, I do not ee why she cannot care for him throughout coming ages.

The longing for everlasting life that I once had was only that selfish desire to be seen in another world promenading around through the golden streets with a crown on my head, and a self-important, peacock-like strut. But I would rather hav the name in this world of being a whole-souled man than to hav eternal life in a thousand hereafters. I say I would rather hav a home in this world with kind words for our creed and smiling faces for our pictures, than to be monarch of all heaven. I do not love the name Spiritualism, it sounds so much like Ghostism. It would seem about as one-sided as revealed religion. It is no kin to Materialism, as the latter is honest enough to reveal itself in daylight to all men alike, while Spiritualism, like revealed religion, has drawn the curtain around itself, and reveals itself only to a few. Why is this selfishness? Are there not millions of honest people who are groping for the best that is in store for the mind? Then why does not Spiritualism come to the front and show the light to all alike? If I now hav a spirit I would rather hav none after death, for I hav never yet heard of any practical benefit derived from the spirit of a dead man; the world has often needed some of these wandering ghosts to protect innocent martyrs, if for nothing else. I should rather my spirit would exist in the memory of pleasantries of the fireside in the minds of my friends than to be taunting my widow to veil her face and wear her life away trying to commune with it. I hav no use for a spirit except in this world, and the one that shows itself in my good works.

W. P. KIRKPATRICK.

God or No God.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is a common thing to hear it said that we must be a clever thinking people, judging by the vast number of newspapers in circulation among us. But when one examins and finds what a vast number of miserable, trashy publications hav extensiv circulation he will conclude 'twere better those who read them were unable to name a letter. There is such a thing as miseducation, as learned error; and ignorance, which is merely the negativ of wisdom, is preferable.

Nine-tenths of the church-members are taught that Infidels and skeptics hav no belief in a supreme being or a future state. Now I find in our Infidel publications the most powerful arguments to prove both, and it would be well for our Christian friends to read our publications. For my part my great difficulty in trying to reason myself into Atheism is this, that if there be no God we must confess that man's intellect is the highest of all existences in creation. I see nothing to cause me to believe that God has ever specially interfered with anything since the great fiat, "Let there be," was conceived, or has ever heard a single prayer or swerved one hair's breadth from the great original design. Man seems no more to him than the gnat or animalcule. The same vicissitudes of time or weather that destroy countless races of invisible beings cause whole races and generations of humanity to perish. But that creation originated independently of some supreme thought, I can no more believe than I can that the obscure ruins of the oldest races of men that ever left a vestige of their work came by natural development with no thinker to precede them.

Those who deny the existence of God assert that man's intellect is the highest of all existing things. The creation is a most amazing, confounding puzzle if there be no intellect higher than man's to comprehend, appreciate, or control affairs. We see man's work and readily ascribe it to man. We see a small part of the universe; we stand speechless before its majesty; and acknowledge its inexpressible wisdom, and we ascribe it to—nothing? A mere principle of growth or development!

If man had designed and set into operation any part of it, even the most insignificant, we would all exclaim, "What a mighty work of intellect is here!" "What a wonderful thinker is man!" One sweeping glance shows us a small part of this our earth and millions of bright points, each one of which we knew to be a world, and we say, "This was done without thought, for there is no thinker above man; there is no God." CLARKE IRVINE.

FRIEND JAMIESON is engaged in Indiana, lecturing. He spoke at Kouts on the 2d inst., and will speak there again on the 9th; will also lecture at Noblesville on the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th. Liberals desiring his services should address him at Albion, Mich., two or three weeks in advance.

Wearing Away.

This mighty conflict which we call existence
Doth wear upon the body and the soul;
Our vital forces wasted in resistance,
So much there is to conquer and control.

The rock that meets the billows with defiance,
Unshaken and undaunted day by day.
In spite of its unyielding self-reliance,
Is by the warfare surely worn away.

And there are depths and hights of strong emotions
That surge at times within the human breast,
More fierce than all the tides of all the oceans
That sweep on ever in divine unrest.

I sometimes think the rock, worn with adventures,
And sad with thoughts of conflicts yet to be,
Must envy the frail reed, which no one censures
When, overcome, 'tis swallowed by the sea.

This life is all resistance and repression;
Dear God, if in that other world unseen,
Not rest we find, but new life and progression,
Grant us a respit in the grave between.

—Ella Wheeler.

If I Were God.

Never should cloud the clear splendor of noon,
If I were God;
Never should blight the bright blossoms of June,
If I were God;
The luminous lilies for ever should shine,
The red roses flame on the lush, trailing vine.
The golden grapes drip with the delicate wine,
If I were God!

The song bird should lilt in an evergreen bower,
If I were God;
And twitter and trill through an eveningless hour,
If I were God;
And never a leaf in the green forest gay
Be borne from its bough, for no dark, wintry day,
Nor blank, thundrous storms should rise wild in our way,
If I were God!

Never a coffin or cold winding-sheet,
If I were God;
Nor blue myrtles creeping at head-stone and feet,
If I were God,
No sad, stricken souls bending down by their dead,
To kiss the pale corpse whence the spirit hath fled,
While the torn bosom bleeds, and the hot tears are shed,
If I were God!

The fires of friendship should faithfully burn,
If I were God;
Heart unto heart should unchangingly turn,
If I were God;
Never should longings be vile or vain,
Never be pestilence, famin, or chain,
Never be poverty, farewell, or pain,
If I were God!

Never a mortal should come unto harm,
If I were God;
Never a gallows should lift its red arm,
If I were God;
Sin should slink far out of sound and of sight,
The wrong that is rapturous always be right,
Nor fagot and sword be the symbols of might,
If I were God!

The dreams be fulfilled of the poets and sages,
If I were God;
And all the grand yearnings of infinit ages,
If I were God;
The march of humanity, strong and sublime,
Should ring with the footfalls of angels in rhyme,
And reason be regnant in every clime,
If I were God!

Home.

Stay, stay at home, my heart, and rest;
Home-keeping hearts are happiest;
For those that wander, they know not where,
Are full of trouble and full of care;
To stay at home is best.

Weary and home-sick and distressed,
They wander east, they wander west,
And are baffled and beaten and blown about
By the winds of the wilderness of doubt;
To stay at home is best.

Then stay at home, my heart, and rest;
The bird is safest in its nest;
O'er all that flutter their wings and fly
A hawk is hovering in the sky;
To stay at home is best.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."
Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY,

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. Price, $1.50. Sold by D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth street, New York.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, hi system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

Gems of Thought.

I MIGHT tell of many benevolent institutions founded by Infidels, but perhaps not run and officered by them, for no matter how strongly a man may make his will against the inroads of wily priests they will find a way to surmount, creep under, or force a way in, as is the case of Girard College, which in its present management is a disgrace to Philadelphia and the whole United States government which allows such a vile tampering with a dead man's bequest to the helpless and innocent orphans. These fanatics literally cry out, "Swallow my dogmas or starve."—Elmina Drake Slenker.

NEITHER is there no use in knowing something about the old paganism of our fathers. Unconsciously and combined with higher things, it is in us yet, that old faith withal. To know it consciously brings us into closer and clearer relations with the past—with our own possessions in the past. For the whole past, as I keep repeating, is the possession of the present; the past had always something true and is a precious possession. In a different time, in a different place, it is always some other side of our common human nature that has been developing itself. The actual true is the sum of all these; not any one of them by itself constitutes what of human nature is hitherto developed. Better to know them all than misknow them. "To which of these three religions do you specially adhere?" inquires Meister of his teacher. "To all the three!" answers the other; "to all the three, for they by their union first constitute the true religion.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

I THINK it best not to dispute when there is no probability of convincing.—Whitfield.

IT is the certainty, the inexorability, of death that makes us certain that its enmity is only superficial; that benignity is at the heart of it. It is because it comes to all; to the best and purest, as well as to the basest and most vile, that we know it is no penalty.—J. W. Chadwick.

THE bishops preach that it is as difficult for a rich man to get into heaven as for a camel to go through the eye of a needle; yet they enrich themselvs and families as greedily and carelessly as if they at any rate never expected to smell brimstone as a consequence.—Bradlaugh's Few Words with the Devil.

THE horrors of theology are brought to a focal point in the doctrin of hell. This is generally among the earliest of the tenets of faith, if not the very first one, to be rejected when a mind once allows itself to reason freely on the subject of religion.—Waters's Through Rome On.

WORTH makes the man, and want the fellow;
And all the rest is mere shoe-leather or prunella.
—Pope.

AND the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man [What do the evangelical preachers say to this certificate of character?], one that feareth God and escheweth evil? And still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him to destroy him without a cause (Job i, 8; ii, 3). Can God be moved against a man to destroy him without a cause? If so, God is neither immutable or all wise. Yet the Bible puts into God's mouth the terrible admission that the devil had moved God against Job to destroy him without cause. If true, it destroys God's goodness; if false, then the Bible is no revelation.—Bradlaugh's Few Words about the Devil.

THE free man is king of himself, but he is ruler of none others; self-respecting, he must respect the rights of others; jealous of his own liberty, he must be equally jealous of the liberty of every one else; stern defender of his own dignity, he must with equal sternness repress any personal inclination, or any inclination of the many to injure the same dignity which is in each individual alike.—Annie Besant.

I HARDLY know which is the greater pest to society, a paternal government which intrudes itself into every part of human life and which thinks it can do everything for everybody better than anybody can do anything for himself; or a careless, lounging government, which suffers grievances such as it could at once remove to grow and multiply, and which to all complaint and remonstrance has only one answer: "We must let things alone; we must let things take their own course; we must let things find their own level." There is no more important problem in politics than to ascertain the just mean between these two pernicious extremes, to draw correctly the line which divides these cases in which it is the duty of the state to interfere from those cases in which it is the duty of the state to abstain from interference.—Macaulay's Speech on the Ten Hours Bill.

MEN who disregard law are generally the enemies, not the friends, of freedom; yet when a wise and sagacious man—with whom an enlightened conscience is the supreme authority, whose life is an exemplification of the principles for which he contends, whose principles are founded upon the impregnable basis of justice—assumes the responsibility of resisting, individually, an outrageous law, willing to giv up his freedom and happiness, and even life if necessary, in order to inaugurate some great needed reform, such courage and sacrifice must even command the respect and admiration of independent, honest, truth-loving men and women.—Index.

Do you ask me if the orthodox teaching may not, after all, possibly be true? I reply only on the postulate or supposition that our primal instincts of justice, truth, etc., may be deceitful. If truth may be what we call untruth, reason unreason, love hate, etc., then orthodoxy may be true; but if the intellectual and moral perceptions are trustworthy, orthodoxy is certainly false.—N. R. Waters.

HOW much better is it to get wisdom than gold? and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver?—Proverbs xvi, 16.

Odds and Ends.

WHO says it's unhealthy to sleep in feathers? Look at the spring chicken and see how tough he is.

WHEN a New Orleans man wanted his picture in a heroic attitude, the artist painted him in the act of refusing to drink.

A RECIPE for lemon pie vaguely adds: "Then sit on a stove and stir constantly." Just as if anybody could sit on a stove without stirring constantly.

ABOUT the guiltiest-looking people in this world is a man accused of a crime of which he is innocent, and a newly-married couple trying to pass for veterans.

THIS is the season when the bees get in their buckwheat honey; but buckwheat honey is a delusion and a snare, and if you don't believe it just try to get some out of a hive when the bees are at home.

A SERVANT girl writes from New York to her friends in Bangor, Maine, that she works in a house called flats, that they go from one story to anotner in ventilators, and send their washing to the foundry.

LOVE.

Mr. Factandfancy has noticed:

That the boy who is most afraid of girls is the first to be corraled into matrimony.

That the little boys prefer boys to girls.

That they soon change, never to go back to their early love.

That the little girls love the girls the best.

That they don't get over their preference as soon as the boys do—some of them never.

That women love the men because they love everything they hav to take care of.

That men love women because they can't help it.

That the wife loves her husband so well that she has no thought for other men.

That the husband so loves his wife that he loves all women for her sake.

That the married man is apt to think himself all killing among the fair sex simply because he has found one woman fool enough to marry him.

That homely husbands are the best. They never forget the compliment paid them by their wives in accepting them.

That homely wives are the truest. They know how to make the most of what they hav.

That the man who marries late in life does well.

That the man who marries young does better.

That the man who never marries is to be pitied.

That the woman who marries does well.

That the woman who does not marry does better nine times out of ten.—Boston Transcript.

A PERTINACIOUS LANDLORD.

"Isn't there such a crime as conduct calculated to provoke a breach of the peace?" asked a nervous-looking man of a Brooklyn police justice.

"Of course there is," responded the justice.

"Then gimme a warrant for my landlord," demanded the nervous man.

"What has he done?" asked the justice, eyeing the suitor snspiciously.

"He comes to my house when I've got company and says he wants the four month's rent I owe him, and sits out on the front steps and howls for his money. If I should kick the whole spine out of him I'd be arrested, wouldn't I?"

"Yes, I think you would. Why don't you pay him?"

"That isn't the question. He comes to my house at 4 o'clock in the morning, and yells through the key-hole, and then he goes up through the vacant house next door, and gets on my roof and shouts down the chimney. Says he will hav that money. If I should drop a flat-iron on him, or blow him up with powder, it would go hard with me, wouldn't it?"

"Pretty apt to. Can't you come to no understanding with him?"

"It seems not. Say, has he got a right to climb over my fence and hav fits in my back yard, just because I owe him a little money?"

"Does he do that?"

"Of course he does, and when we haul him in the house he yells murder and draws a crowd. Hav I got a right to maul the life out of him with a club for that?"

"I think not," responded the judge. "Why don't you move?"

"That's got nothing to do with it. I want to know if he is entitled to slip up on the ice and fall through my basement window and do ten dollars' worth of damage to the glass? Couldn't I mash the stuffing out of him for that?"

"Certainly not."

"But when he lays down on the sidewalk and howls that his mother is dead and he can't bury her because I won't pay what I owe, havn't I got any remedy?"

"I don't know of any. I think you'd better pay him."

"But isn't it conduct calculated to provoke a breach of the peace when he comes around with a quart of laudanum and a horse-pistol and threatens to take 'em both right on the premises if I don't put up? Ain't it a crime to hang himself to a tree in front of my house with a paper pinned on him that I drove him to suicide? Has he got a right to make faces at my children in Sunday-school? Won't the law touch him for coming to my door at daylight as drunk as a lord and claiming he's me and yelling that I want to get in and lick my wife?"

"I don't think you can do anything but pay him or move. The man has a right to his money."

"That's all I want to know," replied the nervous man, appearing relieved. "I'm the landlord, and my tenant says he'll hav me arrested for doing these things. Now you bet he'll put up that wealth or I'll fall off the top of the house and hav the inquest in the parlor. A man can't liv four months in my house without going to some trouble, now you hear me;" and the nervous man pranced off, glowing all over with grim determination.—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE

Radical Rostrum.

REMSBURG'S LECTURES.

1. The Demands of Liberalism.
2. The Taxation of Church Property.
3. The Bible in the Public Schools.
4. The Sabbath, its Origin, Use, and Abuse.

The above lectures constitute an exhaustiv exposition of Liberalism.

5. Irrational Conventionalism.
6. The Evolution of Language.
7. Byron, Burns, and Shelley.
8. Christianity and Rationalism.

Contrasts the character and history of the two, repels the calumnious attacks of the church upon Infidels and Infidelity, and holds up to view her own dark record of cruelty and crime.

9. A Christian Catechism.

A catechetical review of the gospel history of Jesus Christ, exposing by a novel and original method more than two hundred contradictory statements and manifest absurdities contained in Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. Believed to be a complete refutation of the dogmas of Christ's divinity and the inspiration of the scriptures.

10. Our Infidel Fathers.

Presenting an overwhelming array of evidence in support of the fact that Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson were unbelievers or Infidels.

11. Was Lincoln a Christian?

A mass of testimony on this question, much of which has never before been given to the public. Every statement of Holland, Reed, and other Christian claimants shown to be false.

12. Liberty's Apostle, Thomas Paine.

COMMENDATORY.

A smooth and pleasing orator.—St. Joseph Gazette.

Glowing words, an eloquent panegyric.—Kansas City Journal.

For sturdy blows giv us Remsburg every time.—Seymour Times.

His lecture showed deep and thorough research.—Lawrence Standard.

He handled his subject in a remarkably abl manner.—Kansas City Times.

His subjects are logically and eloquently discnssed.—Dr. G. W. Brown, Rockford, Ill.

One of the most brilliant and accomplished young men of this generation.—Concordia (Kan.) Blade.

A scholarly, cultured gentleman; a fluent, forcible, and logical speaker; and a splendid Liberal.—Prof. O. A. Phelps, Ch. Ex. Com. N. L. L.

One of the best writers and speakers upon the subject which he treats to be found in the West, if not in the whole country.—Gov. Charles Robinson.

In Mr. Remsburg the cause of Liberalism has a stanch defender, and science a devotee of no mean order. His lectures are models of logic and good sense.—Hon. A. Krekel, Judge U. S. Dist. Court, Missouri.

In John E. Remeburg bigotry has found no common foe. We hav many speakers and writers who are brilliant, but not logical, and some who are logical but not brilliant; but Remsburg is both brilliant and logical. His style is fascinating and his reasoning irresistible.—Boston Investigator.

An old Illinois journalist who visited the late Encampment of Western Liberals, in a conversation with Gov. Robinson, said, "I hav heard nearly all of our great orators, from Clay to Ingersoll, but I hav never listened to a more polished orat on than Remsburg delivered last night."—Atchison Patriot.

His language was chaste and beautiful, and his well-turned sentences were sublime as the theme of his discourse. The address had all the eloquence proceeding from the composure of genius and the deep emotion of a manly heart conversant with and honestly convinced of the grand truths uttered.—Mirror of Progress.

Liberal societies and others desiring one or more of the above lectures accommodated on reasonable terms. A limited number of engagements for a course of lectures, to be delivered at regular intervals—monthly, semi-monthly, or weekly—during the fall or winter, will be filled. Correspondence invited.

NEWSPAPERS are suppressed by the Captain-General of Cuba for "calumny, defamation, and boastful and exaggerated patriotism."

THE Federal Council of Switzerland has expressed its regret to the municipal authorities of Fribourg that a Jesuit recently preached at that place.

SATAN is to be violently assailed in Chicago this winter. Revivalists Harrison, Whittle, McGranahan, Bliss, and Hammond are all to labor there. Poor Chicago!

MAMIE RICHARDS, a Wisconsin school mistress, is to hav a medal because she walked daily to and from her school through five miles of dense forest, in which were prowling wolves.

THE Belgian idea of Sunday is a festival. On that day they crowd to the seaside to bathe, picnic, and go the places of amusement. On one recent Sunday 7,000 excursionists arrived in Ostend.

PROF. MAX MULLER has taken his seat as foreign member of the French Institute, and delivered an address in French, giving an account of his discovery of Sanskrit manuscripts in Japan.

THE world's Methodist council in London condemned travel by ministers on Sundays, holding that they should travel on the Saturdays, and stay over night where they desired to be on the next day.

THE number of students at the Vienna University is now 2,457, exclusiv of 594 unattached students, or considerably more than at the German universities of Berlin and Leipzig. Thirty-five are Americans.

HAZING at Smith College, the Massachusetts institution for girls, is quite sweet and gentle. The new-comers are seized, led into the main hall, presented with bouquets, kissed affectionately, and then shown the pictures and statuary in the art gallery.

THE inhabitants of the great manufacturing center of Crefeld, Germany, hav begun the construction of a splendid new school of textil industries. It will be replete with appliances appertaining to the production of textils—a laboratory, workshops, library, and museum.

MRS. O'BRIEN publishes a card, at Rock Island, Ill., to say that Methodism is a failure. She has been brought to that way of thinking by the conduct of the Rev. Mr. Meredith, who converted her, induced her to elope from her husband, and finally deserted her.

A NEGRO went home from a Georgia camp-meeting in a state of ecstasy, declared that he was going to heaven by way of a tall tree that grew in the door-yard, climbed to a hight of seventy feet, and then undertook to fly the rest of the journey. The fall killed him.

A COMMON subject for sermons last Sunday throughout the country was the death of Garfield as following the prayers for his recovery. The explanations varied but slightly, and were nearly all that God does not answer prayer when to do so would thwart his all-wise designs.

SINCE the death of Dean Stanley innumerable stories of Westminster Abbey hav come to light. Here is one of the best: "A gentleman passing through the Abbey observed an apparently devout person on his knees. It is true no service was going on, but the occupation was a harmless one. A verger soon took note of the irregularity, and touched the kneeler on the shoulder, informing him that praying was against the rule. "Why, sir," exclaimed the verger with genuin disgust to a bystander, "if I let 'em, we should soon hav 'em prayin' all over the place."

A SCOTCH clergyman who was performing the funeral service over the remains of a neighboring pastor said of the dead man, "He was good man, but he was not perfect." He said this with an air of sadness, as if the poor man ought to have been perfect, and was greatly to blame for being anything short of perfection.

THE help already given to the Michigan fire sufferers, together with the promis of more, has saved many a farm to its owner. Immediately after the fire, speculators hurried into the burnt-over district with cash, expecting to be able to buy the land at trifling prices, but the farmers, encouraged by the prompt assistance, hav declined to sell.

AMERICAN beef is regarded in England as of a superior quality, but they think the mutton we send there is not to be compared in flavor or tenderness with that of home production. The reason for this is that our sheep are generally treated in a way to favor the growth of their fleeces, without much consideration of the quality of the mutton.

POKER has ruined Dr. E. J. Hoffman, of Louisville. He had a large practice, was an activ Methodist, and his reputation was excellent. Becoming infatuated with the game, he neglected his patients to play it, borrowed all the money he could to meet his losses, and finally forged checks amounting to $2,000, for which he is jail. His church loses $600.

THE First Baptist church of Macon, Ga., undertook to benefit its members temporally by means a co-operativ society, the members of which could buy goods at a reduced price while they lived, and be buried free when they died. Deacon Jeremiah Pounds was elected President, Secretary, Treasurer, and general manager. As soon as the fund reached $1,500 he stole it.

THE report of the newly-established analytical laboratory in Paris shows that out of 455 samples of wine purchased by the inspectors in the month of June, 318 were adulterated; out of 22 of cider, 16; out of 180 of milk and cream, 120; out of 18 of butter, 10. No fewer than 48 of the 54 samples of spices analyzed were condemned in like manner. The report on chocolate and sweetmeats is scarcely more favorable.

IT is probable that before Christmas the fate of Newgate as a prison will be sealed, as all the authorities approve the proposed destruction of this famous London jail. There was a prison of Newgate long before the present building was erected from the designs of George Dance. The foundation stone was laid in 1770. In 1780, before it was finished, it was attacked by the Lord George Gordon rioters, who liberated three hundred prisoners and set fire to the edifice. It was repaired in 1782.

A MILWAUKEE dispatch says: "A recent Washington despatch to the effect that Guiteau based his hopes of marrying a rich widow upon the securement of a government appointment, has caused much talk in this city. While conducting revival meetings here last June, Mrs. Sarah Van Cott exhibited several letters written to her by Charles J. Guiteau, prefacing the act with the statement, in substance, that Charles J. Guiteau was formerly an Infidel, who had been converted through her efforts, and that since his conversion he was the smartest and most influential young man in Chicago. The letters were neatly tied together with a perfumed blue ribbon, and were a mixture of ambiguous dissertations upon things spiritual, rhapsodical references to his all-absorbing affection, profound admiration for and inexpressible gratitude to the lady evangelist who, he said, had saved him. Said one of the ladies who was privileged to read the letters, 'Mrs. Van Cott expressed great pride in showing the letters, and seemed highly to esteem the author.' The lady says that she knows that Mrs. Van Cott is the wealthy widow the crack-brained fellow thought he could marry."

WILL you walk right down to Dantzic, said the kaiser to the czar;
I'd like to hav a talk with you where no assassins are.
We needn't there hav any fear of Vera Sassulitch,
Of Hartmann or Perovsky, of dynamite and sich.
Will you, won't you, will you, won't you
Come down, Mr. Czar? —Graphic.

THE pastors of the Washington churches agreed the other day to call on the President in a body. Thus no one would get the start of the other, and each would be on hand to see what the other was about. This was better than the rivalry of the Long Branch pastors, when the late President first visited that watering-place with his wife, who was ill. There was a rush to his hotel to invite him to church for the following day, which was Sunday. Square dealing is best in all trades and professions.

PROF. DAWSON, of the Dominion Geological Survey, reports that the forests of Columbia are of vast importance. Many first-class mills hav been established, and the total annual product is about 200,000,000 feet. Dawson estimates that timber covers 110,000,000 acres, or two-thirds of the whole province. The Douglass fir or Oregon pine is the most valuable commercial tree. It frequently exceeds eight feet in diameter, and rises to a hight of from 200 to 300 feet, forming great and dark forests.

GOVERNOR ST. JOHN, of Kansas, will enter the senatorial canvas in that state on his temperance and anti-monopoly record. St. John may be a fanatic and a fop; he may be riding the popular whirlwind to attain his selfish aims, as some of our Kansas friends charge, and he may paint his moustache and oil his hair, but he is unquestionably a man of ability and a shrewd politician, and his chances of succeeding Senator Plumb are good.—Falls City (Neb.) Journal. There are three things that Gov. St. John has set out to do, viz.: First. He has undertaken to destroy Liberalism and build up a church oligarchy in Kansas. Second. He has undertaken to make men sober by enacting a law that they shall not drink. Third. He is trying to "lift" himself up to the United States Senate. Thus far he has not met with a single success. Liberalism is of tenfold greater proportions to-day than it was a year ago, and on every hand the churches are weakening. There are more drunken men in Kansas now than when his "Prohibition Amendment" took effect. Kansas will never swap a Plumb for a toothpick.—Cloud County Blade.

MONCURE D. CONWAY says: "I believe that the work which Mrs. Annie Besant has achieved within the past year is unparalleled by the achievement of any living person. While lecturing to many thousands throughout the country with never-failing eloquence, always holding her audience spell-bound, while at the same time doing the larger part of the editorial work of the National Reformer, and while organizing branches of the League for the defense of constitutional rights, this lady has carried on private studies (without the aid of professors) which hav brought her successfully through the severe examinations of the University of London for the first division of the B. Sc. degree. Mrs. Annie Besant sitting in her lonely home, her lovely child now away from her, only the great, kindly Newfoundland dog that was its playmate remaining with her, toiling to teach herself while she teaches others, is really as heroic a figure as any in contemporary England. Instead of being recognized as the noble woman she is, this lady is brutally slandered by the Christian charity which thinketh all the evil it can of every independent mind. Members of Parliament and clergymen hav uttered the vilest insinuations as to her relations with Bradlaugh. Those who know the facts most intimately can alone realize the deep infamy of these falsehoods concerning this pure and heroic woman."

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XXVII.

A few hours afterward I met Madame de Sonnes. A silent fear stole over me. She smilingly came toward me, and said, "What did you make out of Clementine? She is filled with animation, she speaks in verses; she does not walk any more, she floats, as if with wings! And now, Alamontada, why do you turn red? I owe you thanks, but how shall I thank?"

While she said this, she embraced and kissed me.

"You are a good man!" she continued. "I well knew the secret reasons for which you wanted to leave us."

I was so surprised that I could not reply a word.

"Strange enough, now, perhaps you think I had not guessed anything? You always want to be the more acute one, Alamontada, and always are so; but not this time! Do you think I had not noticed that you loved Clementine? Why would you make a secret of that, and to me, the mother of your loved one?"

"Madame," stammered I, more and more confused.

"I think you would like to deny still, if you could!" said she in a playful tone. "I stood beside you both when you in the fulness of your happiness no longer saw the world and myself, and then I felt that you could well do without me at your betrothal. My daughter livs for you; make her happy, and I too shall then be so."

What a woman! I sank at her feet and kissed her good hand, without being able to utter a single word.

"Not so!" said she; "a son does not kneel before his mother."

"Madame," exclaimed I, "you grant more than the boldest hope."

"I giv nothing!" replied she; "no, my dear, you are the one that givs peace to us. I am mother, it is true, but without rights over the heart of my daughter. Clementine knows you longer than I. For your sake she rejected many a hand. She hoped only for you. To secure Clementine's happiness is my duty. I also hav become more acquainted with you, and bless Clementine's choice."

"It is too much!" cried I. "To be sure it was my resolution, some day, when I had secured for me a fortune large enough; I am poor, Madame."

"What has fortune to do with this affair?" answered the noble woman. "You hav a sufficient income, and Clementine, wealthy already in her own right, is my heiress. Cares for subsistence can not trouble you; and should you through a very great misfortune lose everything, then accommodate yourselvs to circumstances. You hav education, energy, and honesty, thus you can not want for anything."

In vain I made several objections. But the woman was too noble to feel their weight.

"No, sir," said she; "that you loved Clementine without regard to riches, I well knew. And truly, the girl has excellent qualities enough to be loved for her own sake. Your sensitivness, my dear, remains unhurt. Could you ask and accept Clementine's heart, surely, you should not blush if she brings you a rich dowry. The heart which you gain is worth more than the miserable money, before which you are so timid as being too much. My daughter can not be happier if she marries a million to which is attached an unloved man; she can become so only through the spirit, through the noble mind, through faithful love, through the care of the loved one for her."

"And?" said Clementine, as she in her charming innocence lightly entered the room, took my hand, and looked her noble mother, with a friendly mien, in the eyes.

"Thou hast chosen well!" said Madame de Sonnes, as she embraced us both. "Thou always carest more for the happiness of thy mother than for thyself."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Clementine was my betrothed. The whole family treated me with the greatest regard. I was looked upon in the palace De Sonnes as the beloved son. The esteem of the whole town surrounded me. I had reached my highest aim, and it would be tiresome if I should begin to picture the manifold pleasures I enjoyed.

The Marshal de Montreval received letters from London, as governor of the province, for my deceased father, besides an inheritance which his brother, who had died in the West Indies, had left him. I hastened for a few days to Nismes, to the marshal, in compliance with his order. He showed me only the letter of the London banker and the copy of the Testament, without being able to giv me any further explanation. The fortune had, by drafts on the bank of Paris, been already delivered over to the government of Lauguedoc, and I the only heir. This placed me in the enjoyment of a yearly income of four thousand francs.

Although I knew that one of my relativs, in his youth, had gone to America, from whence never again had anything been heard of him, I could hardly believe that he had amassed so large a fortune. Even the obscurity which prevailed in the London reports about several noteworthy things caused me to look somewhat suspiciously at this wealth, at least in so far as it was meant to be an inheritance, although it seemed to be too large to be a present for me. I wrote, not only to the banker in London, but also to the magistrate of the province in America where my relativ was said to hav died. But never had I discovered more than I already knew. And for that reason I could not rid myself of the thought that Madame Bertollon, more than my relativ, had played an acting part.

Marshal de Montreval seemed almost to become displeased with my scruples. "Enjoy your indisputable property, and hav a dozen masses said for your cousin," said he; "and in order that you may not enjoy your fortune altogether idly, come to me and accept the head place in the chancery office of the government of the province. Yet one condition I must make. You are not allowed to liv anywhere else than in my castle. I must see you daily. My business is extensive, and your advice is of too much value to me."

I thanked the marshal for the honoring proofs of his grace. I only begged for time to consider the acceptance of a situation to the importance of which my knowledge was not adequate. The marshal overloaded me with politenesses, and sent me away with friendly threats if I should not soon conclude to accept the situation.

Mr. Etienne, my good old uncle, was beside himself with joy when he heard from me the offer of the marshal.

"When thou, as a boy, camest to me in thy linen coat and wooden shoes," said he, "O Colas, and when thou wast standing before me in thy poverty, moving my heart, then it was as if I heard the inner voice of the spirit which commanded me to adopt thee as a child, for thou wouldst become in time the guardian angel of the persecuted believers. Behold, Colas, the Lord has done great things for thee. Thou standest there again now on the same place in the poor miller's house, and art a highly esteemed, learned, and rich man. Do now no longer refuse to accept the offer of the marshal. It is not his will; no, it is God's will. It is not his call; it is the call of heaven which, to the consolation of the evangelical Christians, has come to thee."

My uncle, and the amiable family, in whose circle only one daughter was missing, who was married, and all his friends, who were, without exception, secret Protestants, did not cease to implore me in the most earnest manner. I was compelled to half promis to accept the position. I only wished yet to find out the opinion of Clementine and her mother about it.

But both, as soon as I had made known to them the offer of the marshal, were at once of the opinion that I should not let an opportunity escape to secure for myself a more extensiv circle of activity.

"And we accompany you to Nismes," said Clementine. "You recollect, no doubt, the amphitheater and Alberta's house? But liv with the marshal? No, that you must graciously refuse to him."

And so it was done. We went together to Nismes. I entered upon my position, and was allowed to rest from business in the arms of Clementine.

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER VII.

CONCERNING THE CUSTOMS OF THE JEWS.

If we examin the fables of the Jews relating to their customs, do we not find these customs as abominable as their fables are absurd? They are, upon their own confession, robbers who carried everything in the desert which they had stolen from the Egyptians. Their chief, Joshua, crossed the Jordan by means of a miracle similar to the miracle performed in the passage of the Red Sea. And for what purpose? In order to put to fire and sword a city which was not known, a city which God destroyed by the sound of a horn.

The Grecian fables were more humane. Amphion built cities by the sound of a flute. Joshua destroyed them. He delivered to sword and flames old men, women, children, and cattle. Could cruelty be more senseless?

He is not excused because a prostitute betrayed her people. But what need was there for the perfidy of that unfortunate woman when a horn was sufficient to overthrow all the walls? The trumpet of Astolphe put to flight the whole world. And here we may be allowed to observe that the woman hamed Rahab, the prostitute, was one of the ancestors of that Jew whom we hav for some time worshiped as a God, and who counts among his ancestors the incestuous Tamar, the imprudent Ruth, and the adulterous Bathsheba.

It is also related that Joshua captured thirty-one kings of the country, that is to say, thirty-one captains of a village, who fought for their homes against a troop of assassins. If the author of that history had intended to render the Jews hateful in the eyes of other nations, would not that be cause enough? The author, adding blasphemy to robbery and barbarity, dares to say that all those abominable practices were committed in the name of God, and by the express order of God, and that they were merely sacrifices of human blood offered to the creator.

Such are the divine people! The Hurons, Canadian Indians, and the Iroquois are certainly philosophic and humane compared to the children of Israel. It is in behalf of such monstrous people that God stopped the sun and the moon in full day! and why? To giv them time to pursue and slaughter the poor Amorites, already crippled by a rain of heavy stones which God had hurled at them from the clouds, along five leagues of their route. Is this the history of Gargantau, or is it the history of the people of God? Which is the most repugnant, the excess of horror or the excess of absurdity? Could there be any other way than ridicule by which we can amuse ourselvs fighting that set of detestable fables which outrage good sense, virtue, nature, and the divine power itself? If, unfortunately, only one of the events concerning that people had been true, all the other nations would hav wanted to exterminate them; if they were false, then one could not be more foolish.

What can we say of Jephthah, who sacrificed his own daughter to his sanguinary God; and of the ambidextrous Ehud, who assassinated Eglon, his king, in the name of the Lord; and of the divine Jael, who killed General Sesara by driving a nail into his dead; and of the debauched Samson, whom God favored by so many miracles? This last tale is a gross imitation of the fable of Hercules.

What shall we say of that Levite who rode into Gaba upon an ass with his concubine and some straw and hay, and who belonged to the tribe of Benjamin What must we think of the Benjamites who wished to commit sodomy with that old priest, just as the Sodomites had endeavored to commit the same crime with the angels?* The Levite compromised with them and abandoned his mistress or his woman to the Benjamites, who enjoyed her all night and then murdered her next day. The Levite cut his concubine into a dozen parts with his knife, a thing, by the way, not so easily done, and thereupon civil war followed.

The eleven tribes armed four thousand soldiers against the tribe of Benjamites. Four hundred thousand soldiers in a territory which was about fifteen leagues long and five or six wide! The grand Mogul never had the half of such an army. The Israelites slaughtered the people of the tribe of Benjamin, the old and the young, the women and children, according to the approved custom of those times. Six hundred men escaped. It was not necessary that every one in the tribe should perish. It became necessary to giv six hundred women to these six hundred men. What did the Israelites do? There happened to be a small village called Jabesh-gilead in their neighborhood. The Israelites surprised the people of this village, killed them all; even the animals were slaughtered. But they reserved four hundred girls for the Benjamites. Therefore there were two hundred men who were without girls. We must agree that they were right when they stole two hundred girls who were dancing before the portals of Shiloh. (Judges xx, 2.) But Abaddie, Sherlock, Houteville, and there confreres brought arguments in justifica-

*The illustrious author forgot to speak of the angels of Sodom. But that topic is too horrible. In the whole history of the Jewish people there could be no greater or more abominable extravaganza than that story about the angels whom the magistrates, the street porters, and even the boys, wished to violate. No pagan fable equals this. Such a tale makes the hair stand on end. Some people dare to comment upon such abominable stories and make the young children respect them, and then hav the insolence to complain of the Brahmans of India and of the Magii of Persia, to whom God has not revealed such things because they were not his chosen people. There are still people among us with souls so low and base who say, "Believe these infamous tales or the wrath of an avenging God will fall upon you; believe, or we will persecute you whether you be in the consistory or in the conclave, or in office or at the bar or in a tavern." How long shall the rogues make sensible men tremble? Yet they suffer them to exist, and shall I add, some even adore them. What imbecils! what monsters! [1776.]

The world has advanced since Voltaire's days. The clergy are less dogmatic and the church less powerful. The priests are more humble and no longer threaten persecution for disbelief, but are content to picture the tortures of the lower regions Had Voltaire lived in the present time he could hav lectured and written without fear of disturbance, as his follower and fellow-countryman Renan has done. The force, therefore, of Voltaire's note is lost upon us who liv in a comparativly free age. [Note by the translator.]

tion of these cannibal-like fables, and endeavor to prove that all this was a mark, a figure of speech, which announced the coming of Jesus Christ.

LECTURE I.

THE ASCENT, INSTEAD OF THE DESCENT OF MAN.

Scientific criticism has made sad work with the stories of the divine and perfect origin of man. The fables of his creation, and of a perfect Adam and Eden, pass, together with the traditions of all other ancient peoples, into the limbo of mythology. But our tears over Paradise Lost cannot blind us to the fact that science thereby proves that we are not standing in a line of degredation as degenerate angels, but of advancement in a gradual progress in which our future may more than equal the dream of the mythical Eden and Golden Age. It asks us, Is it not better to hav the troglodite and cannibal savage in the past rather than in the future of our race?

This fact of progress brings us to a conclusion which makes our inquiry possible. It is that the sciences of biology, sociology, ethnology clearly indicate the conditions and the general laws under which human progress has taken and is now taking place. The scheme of salvation is thus replaced by the law of evolution—the law of progress. It is plain that our further inquiry can be only as to the meaning and application of this law, and that our first step must be to grasp it as intelligently, and in as few words, as we can.

What, then, is the fundamental law of the progress of society? It is, clearly, in general terms, the great law of all organic growth, the correspondence of the organism (society) to its medium or environment; that is, the world about it, and its own past history. This law was discovered by, and becomes intelligible only in the works of, the scientific biologists—in the school of Spencer, Haeckel, Huxley, Darwin, St. Hilaire, Goethe, Lamarck, Von Baer, Oken, and their successors. Through their labors we have come to see that life is the organic action of the body, i. e., of the cells and tissues of every organism, plant, or animal, great or small, by which the whole organism continuously reacts upon and adjusts itself to its environment. The organism is thus the correlative of its past and present world, from which it lives and grows.

To supply the losses caused by this reaction, assimilation of food, and hence growth, takes place as long as growth is able to maintain the organism. We see also that the organism inevitably becomes more and more complex in order to answer to the increasing complexity of its outer world. Again, the different parts or organs of the organism become more and more distinct and special in their functions, while the functions are increasingly integrated, and coöperate in a greater degree toward the support and defense of the whole organism. Thus progress is the process of answering more and more completely to the every-increasing demands of the environment. This process is furthered by the increasing unity or integration of the functions of organs that are themselves differentiated more and more as the organism grows, and as it rises in the scale of istence.

The history of the organic world, from the jelly-like amœbæ to man, is but the illustration of this law. When the organism can no longer support or defend itself—that is, when it can no longer adjust itself to its environment—it fails, to use Darwin's phrase, "in the struggle for existence," and dies, or falls a prey to its enemies. This law of correspondence to the environment is the greatest law of all organic life.

Modern biology shows that all of the varieties and species of plants and animals, including man, have protoplasm as their principal and common material. They are all the results of the accumulated changes of organisms brought about by the changing demands of their environments, and which changes have been inherited and increased from generation to generation. We have explained this fundamental law of plant and animal physiology to gain the sure ground for an illustration that throws the greatest light upon sociology.

For, if we turn from biology to the next higher science, sociology, we find that societies of insects and of animals, and in a still greater degree those of the human race, are composite growing organisms, equally subject to this fundamental law of the whole organic world. This might be abundantly illustrated by the history of the separate tribes and races of the remote past, and is especially true of that Humanity of the present, which has inherited and absorbed all that the isolated and partly civilized parts of the race have hitherto worked out. We can only allude to the steps by which this grand human organism has gradually grown into existence and become recognized.

Hobbes saw the civil State as the "Great Leviathan," and ever since his great work, the organic nature of societies and of Humanity, as a whole, has become more and more the basis of all scientific sociology and politics. All this will appear plainer and more and more important if you trace the growth and history of this grand conception of Humanity from Cicero and the Roman lawyers through St. Augustine, Dante, Pascal, Hume, Kant, Diderot, Turgot, Condorcet, Herder, Goethe, Fourier, Comte, and Spencer, until finally we are able to realize as well as to idealize Humanity as an organized Being surrounding and governing our planet—the grandest living Being known to us.

But the important fact is that this organic law of "correspondence to the environment" applies to nations, or peoples, and to all societies of the human race in all their variety of time or place, and even to Humanity, considered as the whole coöperating human race. For these are all conditioned by their past and by the world in which they live, and thus they have the laws of growth, of convergence, and of adjustment similar to those simpler and lower organisms of which biology treats.

Now, if this is true, our solution is found. This law must be applicable to our age; that is, to our present stage of progress, and must generally at least, indicate to us our own future line of evolution and fate, and therefore our present duty. It becomes the gravest of questions, then, to see how the fatalities of this present life will be increased or relieved in proportion as we neglect or recognize and conform to this law and the conditions with which the progress of social evolution, under this law, has actually surrounded us. We hav thus a light to guide our feet. This law at once makes sociology a science. It becomes at once the soul and philosophy of history. As it explains the human past, it must explain our present and future.

Let us, then, begin with our first lesson in this application. The very first result is terribly destructive. This law is enough of itself to destroy all theological method and authority. The past becomes under it simply the groundwork—the material, for an ever-changing and growing future. Under this law there can be no fixed or permanent Church or Book or Revelation upon which man can permanently found his habits, culture, institutions, or hopes as upon the "Rock of Ages."

For the law is certain and inevitable that as time, our human past, changes and enlarges the world; that is, the human environment, the life of man, internal and external, individual and social, must be proportionably and constantly changed and advanced. That is the reason that peoples and nations who were taught and made to believe in a stationary superstition, or an iron-bound creed, have become the dependents or slaves of the more elastic and progressive portions of the human family. Nations and peoples who try to believe in an iron-bound way now, must become stunted and retrograde. Life and growth is but another name for constant alteration and change. Permanency in human affairs can only mean steady growth and progress; it rests upon a slow but healthy adjustment, which gives flexibility. Wisely the poet Goethe admonishes us to "pliantly wander through the fields of the richly-stored earth." The peoples who succeed are those who were, and are, ever ready and skilled to adopt and adapt.

The first difficulty, then, with theology as a basis of civil and religious life, as above noted, is explained. Its absolute character tends to make its adherents stationary. It is thus brought into direct conflict with the human and relative character of science, which encourages the freedom and the changes which are necessary to progress and growth. For example, the earlier civilizations of our race were founded upon theology in the form of fetichism (as in China) or of astrolatry (as in Egypt and Assyria), and the permanence of the worshiped fetiches and of the constant never-changing stars became a spiritual and an actual tyranny, and gave only those limited, stationary, and unprogressive civilizations which Rawlinson describes in his great work on the "Five Ancient Hierarchies." Those peoples were consequently readily resisted or conquered by polytheistic peoples, who, from the variety and independence of their spiritual and unlocated deities, were at home everywhere, and everywhere ready to conquer other peoples, and adopt neighboring gods, customs, and arms. Of all this the histories of the Greeks and Romans, of Alexander and Cæsar, with altars to the unknown gods, and a crowded Pantheon, are well known illustrations. They were the readiest to learn from their enemies and to assimilate them.

The monotheistic faiths, that is to say, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity, on the contrary, although the most condensed, warlike, powerful, and destructive for the first few centuries of their growth, soon afterward became permanent, and then retrograde and revolutionary to the more advanced part of the race. The reason is clear. Their one God was believed to cease to act through inspiration, and became finally revealed in one prophet, church, or book. Then all change, all gradual and healthy growth, stopped. In the place of growth we find persecution and repression, until that becomes intolerable, and then "reformations," revolts, and revolutions inevitably followed, and must continue.

Thus EVOLUTION, the first law of sociology, shows us plainly that monotheism, and all "religions" and churches based upon it, must, after a few centuries, tend to become the deadly and persecutive foe of human liberty, science, and progress. Time always tends to convert the old God, as it did the old gods, into a new devil—the foe of humanity. Thus, to the early Christians, Jove and his hundred celestials became and were called veritable "demons"—i. e., devils. Our latter-day Christians, in their turn, are pained to hear their God, the successor of Jove, cursed by French "Atheists" as l'Enemi, "the Enemy!" that is, the condensed devil of mankind. Indeed, all European wars, revolutions, and general history for the last three hundred years—since 1600—have been, or are being, but plain illustrations of this law, and are best explained by its application, and by it our age and its strivings become intelligible.

Mark well this date—1600! For that year, under the law we are following, becomes perhaps the most important and noteworthy in all human history. It was the keystone year of the great bridge of time that passes from the old fixed theologic, to the undetermined, unforeseen scientific world of the now and the future.

That was the date of the new era. A novus ordo rerum then began because of a fundamentally new environment to all civilized mankind. For then it was that the discoveries of Da Gama, Columbus, Magellan, Copernicus, Bruno, and Galileo literally brought to man a new heaven and a new earth. If those wonderful men had bodily transplanted the whole human race to the planet Mars, supposing it to have the conditions of human life, it is doubtful whether the change could have been so great. The thoughts of men were then literally and suddenly "widened out" of their old world. Under these discoveries the "firmament of heaven," with its Divine Father and heavenly hosts, vanished into the Infinite. The "fixed" earth rolled under their feet, an insignificant planet of an insignificant sun star.

It will be seen at once that these changes, under evolution, the social law of progress, must have involved a thousand others—and one by one they came, and still are coming. The whole nature of man, individual and social; the fate of his body and soul; his capacities and knowledge, were and still are called to undergo changes new and strange, to meet this new world. We may indeed say new world, for what have the advanced scientists now in common with the mass of the human species as they existed prior to 1600? Hardly more than a similar animal body and a little language and civil law! Never was there a change, physical and mental, so great and so sudden! The old environment had passed away. "All things must become new," but how and when became then and still remain our pressing impending questions. The future of the human race must be explained by the same law of evolution that explains its past. It would be stupid to waste time upon the old notion of the degeneration of the race after its perfect beginning in Adam and Eve. The ascent of man and of civilization by evolution from a savage origin is so plainly shown by Lubbuck, Tyler, Spencer, and indeed by all archæologists, that no intelligent voice now maintains the old theologic notion. Science has reversed our past Eden. Can it light our way to a future Paradise? Science only can answer. In the light of this law of evolution it is as clear as noonday that this great astronomical change we have noted can never become realized by the masses of the people, in its consequences, without compelling in them a new life, with new social conditions, institutions, destiny, and hopes; in other words, a new philosophy and a new religion. To realize this we have only to take up and to follow out this change of environment to its logical results. We have to ask, what have been, and must be, the main consequents of the great Astronomical Revolution of 1600? Let us look on the affirmative as well as the negative side of these changes; and if we are following a true law, it must be that those consequences are in and of themselves the new gospels and harmonies of science unfolding before us. Let us begin then with the one that is fundamental, the discovery of the nature of truth. That is the first of the harmonies.

A MOVEMENT is on foot to raise subscriptions to pay the expenses of the Reverend Hallelujah Cox and Moody and Sankey to Fort Apache. There seems to be little doubt but that these three evangelists would do noble work in evangelizing the Apache Indians, and that they are thirsty for the work. If Henry Ward Beecher, Mayor Kalloch, and a few more of that ilk would also join the band of missionaries, it is probable that every Apache in Arizona would become deeply convinced, and there is no doubt that the scalps of the reverend gentlemen would be preserved for all time as holy relics of these great saints.—San Francisco News Letter.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1881.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

WE hav plenty more of those colored posters on hand which we will gladly send to any friend who takes enough interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER to aid in extending its circulation.

WE would call attention to a new work we hav just issued, "Voltaire in Exile." It is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland, his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the great, Catharine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world by his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

We will fill orders as fast as they come, and hope to send off a good many. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

Report of the Fifth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

HELD AT HERSHEY'S MUSIC HALL, CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 30TH–OCTOBER 3D.—A MOST ENTHUSIASTIC, HARMONIOUS, AND SUCCESSFUL MEETING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My instructions were to report the Congress as effectivly as possible without swamping your paper with an ocean of words and details. The only way to do that is to giv an outline of the proceedings and to call attention to the salient points. The speeches may be printed afterward, as your space will permit. The delegates assembled on Friday, September 30th, and after a great deal of hand-shaking and a pleasant reunion of friends, the Congress was called to order by the President, Hon. Elizur Wright, who delivered an Introductory Address, which has been printed at length in the Boston Investigator of this week. The editor of that paper says that it is one of the best things it has ever printed, and those who heard it will join in that opinion. He made a masterly exposition of the three main planks of the League—1. The separation of church and state; 2. The protection of all citizens in equal rights and privileges, without regard to religious beliefs; 3. The universal secular education of the people. He proved that none of these objects had ever been fully attained in our Republic, though a great step was taken in that direction when our Federal Government was founded by the Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution. But this step was largely, if not principally, on paper. It would be the work of the League to see them realized by effecting first the three acts of justice it proposed, as above stated. Thereafter the other evils that oppress society, and especially financial cannibalism, which he explained most clearly and graphically, will be in the way of removal with its vast train of evils. His concluding words had great effect, and should be pondered by every friend of Liberalism in the League, and especially by those out of it.

He said: "Organization, without usurpation, is always good. There is hardly any organization in the world without its utilities. The most useful are those where the most gifted and best trained minds meet the humblest, least trained, and of the wildest and most erroneous opinions, on a perfect equality as to authority, and where reason does all the work instead of authority. I confidently trust, ladies and gentlemen, that this League is bound to exist and grow, and to bind together the most and the least thinking minds—or, if anybody pleases, the best and the worst thinking—till it envelopes our whole country and ceases to exist because its work is done."

Mr. Verity, of Boston, upon the conclusion of the President's address, moved that three committees be appointed to conduct the business of the Congress. He thought these Committees should be, one on Credentials and Membership, one on Resolutions and Future Work, and one on Nomination of Officers of the League for the ensuing year.

Mr. Follett, of Illinois, decidedly objected to the appointment of any committee to nominate annual officers. It was a method by which a "slate" might be imposed upon the Congress, and he was principled against it.

Mr. Verity then moved the appointment of the two first committees, which was agreed to. The Secretary, Mr. T. C. Leland, together with the Committee on Credentials, soon made a partial report that one hundred and twenty-five delegates, representing sixty-six Leagues, had already appeared and that many more, probably twice as many, Leagues would be represented before the close of the Congress. This proved to be the case, a large part of the delegates appearing the next day, and especially on Sunday, when the hall was well filled by the delegates and audience in the evening.

The Committee on Resolutions and Future Work was as follows: George Chainey, of the Paine Hall League, Boston, Chairman; T. B. Wakeman, New York; J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California; and Mr. Sloan, of Chicago.

The question of the appointment of a committee on nomination of officers was then taken up again and adopted notwithstanding Mr. Follett's continued objection. He was immediately requested to act as chairman of the committee so as to prevent any slate, but declined, and the committee was appointed by the Congress upon open nominations, with instructions not to report until the Committee on Credentials had completed its report, and to gather the sentiments of the members as far as possible before reporting.

The rest of the afternoon was occupied by conference reports from the several Leagues in short speeches, which were extremely valuable and interesting, and which were continued until darkness compelled an adjournment.

The announcement that Mr. Chainey would open the continued reports of the Leagues in the evening by an address upon "Secular Education" largely increased the audience notwithstanding a threatening rain.

His address fully equaled the expectation the announcement had excited. He dwelt upon the impossibility of a secular state without a secular people, and that secular education alone could giv us such a people, and that no agency now existed so capable of effecting this object as the League itself. For that reason he had come to cast in his lot with it. He took as his text the fifth and sixth objects of the League as stated in its Constitution. He stated that he had supposed that the Constitution of the League would hav to be enlarged in order to do the great work of secular education, but he found that the Constitution covered the ground completely, and to his great satisfaction. All that remained now was for the League to carry out the measures to effect these objects as stated in his text, and it would confer the greatest possible benefit upon our country. He proceeded to state in detail how this could be effected and in what spirit of charity and forbearance it was necessary to work for it. A lecture bureau and improved lecturers, a library and newspapers in each League, a Sunday-school for adults and children, social meetings with music, were among the means to be insisted upon.

At the close of Mr. Chainey's address the League reports were resumed with great earnestness. It is impossible to refer to these interesting accounts and proposed methods of League work in detail. These reports were the most useful part of the congress work, but no account of them can be given without exhausting your space. They abundantly compensate for the great expense and time taken in holding these annual congresses. Mr. Edward King, of the New York Liberal League, gave a very instructiv account of the educativ methods of Liberals in Scotland and England. Mr. E. C. Walker reported for Iowa, Mr. Follett for Illinois, Messrs. Wakeman and Green for New York, Mr. Mendum for Massachusetts, and so the evening was spent, as the story went from League to League, and before it was thought that the hour to adjourn was near it had passed.

The next (Saturday) morning the League met to hear the annual reports of the secretary and treasurer and also the reports of the committees of the League which had been appointed the day before.

Mr. Leland, the Secretary, led off with his annual report. It was clear, full of information and unsparing in its wit to both friends and foes of the League. He alluded to the split that occurred in the Convention last year as a very small affair, that took from the League only three individuals and four auxiliary societies. The blow that the League got was one given in the house of its friends, but the patient was recovering. The League was growing rapidly. When the first convention was held in Rochester, N. Y., there were but eighteen societies represented. At the convention of 1878 there were sixty-four auxiliaries included in the League. To-day the League has one hundred and seventy-five auxiliaries in its activ membership, besides fifty others that were no more inactiv than were many branches of the Christian church or the Young Men's Christian Association. He referred to the success of the League's paper, the League Man, as auspicious of the final success of Liberalism.

There is no space to giv any more of this remarkable report, even by a summary. It was an admirable piece of work, and will doubtless be fully printed and be circulated largely.

At the conclusion of this report the Congress, by motion, voted to continue League Man, if possible, as an organ of the League.

The next report was from Mr. T. B. Wakeman, the Treasurer. He showed how the accounts were kept so as to avoid any error, or spending of money without the direction of the President and Secretary and proper vouchers therefor. The receipts had been for the year $902.62 and the expenses $1,191.80, leaving $289.18 due to the Treasurer, who did not press for immediate payment, a remark which was received with applause.

The report of the League, written by Mr. Leland, the Secretary, to be sent to the European Congress of Liberals directed by last year's Congress at Belgium to be held at London this year, was read and heartily approved. It was sent to Mr. D. M. Bennett, now in Europe, to be presented, and was reprinted in your last TRUTH SEEKER.

While the Committees on Officers and Resolutions were further deliberating, Mr. Wright asked leave to submit some considerations as to the need of a Human Providence in preserving the trees of the earth. The suggestion was received with applause, and the matter submitted was of the greatest interest and importance. Mr. Wright was requested by many present to write out his facts, figures, and views on this important subject and to furnish them for publication and distribution. They should be presented before every state legislature as a basis for legislation next winter. He hoped that secular management of the surface of the earth for the achievement of human welfare would be held to be a part of League work, and would include the important duty he felt to be so necessary, the protection of our forests, and the extension of them largely over barren mountains and prairie land.

The Committee on the Nomination of Officers for the ensuing year then reported through Mr. T. C. Leland, who was selected by them as their chairman for that purpose, as follows:

For President, T. B. Wakeman; Secretary, T. C. Leland; Treasurer, Courtlandt Palmer; Chairman of Executiv Committee, George Lynn, of Illinois; Chairman of Finance Committee, Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California.

As each of these names were read they were received with applause, and they were voted upon separately and unanimously elected. Even Mr. Follett, who had declined to accept this method of nomination, thought the result could not hav been better. Before the vote was taken the Committee explained that Mr. Wright, owing to his age and infirmities, especially an increasing deafness, had positivly declined to be reëlected President, and that he and the Congress had unanimously indicated Mr. Wakeman as his proper successor. This fact necessitated the election of a majority of the Board—that is, the Secretary and Treasurer, from New York, so that a majority could meet readily and often for business, as the constitution had provided. The other officers had been selected from the west. The executiv committees appointed in each of the states would do the work of the states in direct communication with the officers of the Board.

I learn from members of the Committee that there was some division as to the chairmanship of the Executiv Committee. It seems that some were in favor of restoring Mr. H. L. Green to his old place in the League, while others preferred Mr. E. C. Walker, of Iowa The result was that Mr. Lynn was accepted as satisfactory to all. It was thought that no man could resist Mrs. Lake's appeal for money, and when her name was mentioned, there was no other candidate.

Vice-presidents were then elected for at least thirty states, with instructions to the Board of Directors to revise and add to the list.

The St. Louis Delegation then moved that the next Congress of the League be held in that city, and presented such comfortable and substantial reasons therefor that the motion was after discussion unanimously adopted with thanks.

The Congress assembled for its afternoon session at 2 o'clock. Mr. Wright conducted Mr. Wakeman to the platform and introduced him as the new President in a few very happy remarks, concluding with the words: "There is no mistake this time. You hav the right man in the right place." Mr. Wakeman in taking the chair responded in a short, feeling, graceful, sensible speech, which gave great satisfaction, and which I will not try to giv here, as it will doubtless be printed by you in full, and I should only spoil it by giving a fragment.

The next business was the report of the Secretary on Constitutional Amendments, which had been proposed during the year. After careful consideration they were all voted down, except a few formal ones of trivial character. The important expression was thus obtained that the Constitution is satisfactory and reliable, as it was originally adopted in 1876, and that no change that can be suggested seems likely to improve it.

Finally the Committee on Resolutions, headed by Mr. George Chainey, came upon the platform to report. Every resolution was applauded and no dissent was expressed except as to the one that declared that resolutions passed at any one Congress of the League expressed only the sentiments of that Congress by the majority thereat and was no test of membership.

Mr. Gorsuch, of Baltimore, had it read over, and thought there might be some cat in the meal, or nigger in the fence. He would do nothing to lower the standard of the League nor to enable the three or four members who had seceded last year to return, and he feared that some such construction might be given to that resolution. Mrs. Dr. Severance, Mr. Mendum, and others followed in the same strain.

The Chair explained for the Committee that the resolution did little more than restate a clause of the Constitution of the League; that it was necessary to do so to remove a false impression that it was found had prevailed largely to the great detriment of the League; that the supposed twisting of tender consciences of a minority of the League upon any resolution that might be introduced on any subject not in its Constitution would thus be avoided.

Mr. King claimed that the resolution was very necessary to cover the cases of such auxiliaries as the Liberal Club of New York, which could not be bound by any majority in a League Congress because it could never by its Constitution, being a club for discussion merely, hav an opinion as a club on any subject. He thought that the gentleman from Baltimore was "getting his back up" unnecessarily and about a matter that ought to hav been declared long ago, unless it was to be held that the League was to consist of a majority only, and that all minorities were to be cast out of the League on every trivial matter it might pass a resolution about.

Col. Kelso, of California, then obtained the floor, and so plainly showed that the resolution was but a restatement of parliamentary law to remove a false impression, that all opposition to it was disarmed. He said that if after its passage there was any doubt about the position of the Congress on any subject passed upon at a former Congress, the sense of this Congress could be taken on it at once without then appearing to coerce the minority.

The ex-President, Mr. Wright, concurred in this view, and advised that the resolution should pass.

Mr. Gorsuch and several others had fears that if passed just at this time it might be considered as in some way yielding to somebody or to something.

The vote on this special resolution was taken by the delegates rising. Many did not vote, but there were thirty-three in favor of the resolution and seventeen opposed. The other resolutions reported by the Committee were unanimously adopted. Of course, you will print them, and your readers will carefully digest them. They are as follows:

Resolved, That this Congress reaffirms its devotion to the special objects of the National Liberal League as set forth in Article I., II., and III. of the Constitution:

ARTICLE I. The name of this association shall be the National Liberal League.

ART. II. General Object.—The general object of the League shall be to accomplish the total separation of church and state, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood in all human life may be established, protected, and perpetuated.

ART. III. Specific Objects.—1. As means to the accomplishment of this general object, the specific objects of the League shall be to urge the adoption of such a religious-freedom amendment of the United States Constitution as shall effect the complete secularization of the government in all its departments and institutions, state and national, and shall secure to every American citizen the full enjoyment of his opinions on the subject of religion, whatever they may be, without molestation, disability, or deprivation of any civil or political rights.

2. To advocate the equitable taxation of church property, the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, the cessation of all appropriations of public funds for religious institutions or purposes of any kind, the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies, the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath, the non-appointment or religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority, the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely secular government, and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness, and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

3. To promote the formation and multiplication of local auxiliary Leagues throughout the country in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, in order to institute combined and vigorous agitation for the adoption of the religious-freedom amendment, and, pending its adoption, to secure through state and municipal action the accomplishment of the various special reforms above enumerated.

4. To defend, through the courts, by the combined efforts and means of the Liberals of the country, any American citizen whose equal religious or moral rights are denied, or who is oppressed on account of any opinions he may hav held or expressed on the subjects of religion and morals.

5. To promote by all peaceable and orderly means activ propagandism of the principles of religious liberty and equal rights, devotion to truth for its own sake, and universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity, more particularly to establish a Liberal lecture bureau for the mutual benefit of the hearers and lecturers, by which the formation of local Liberal societies may be facilitated and stimulated, and by which Liberal lecturers of sufficient ability and unblemished moral character, without the least discrimination on account of their religious opinions, may be encouraged, furnished with employment, and helped to devote themselvs to the Liberal cause.

6. In all proper and practical ways to promote the final emancipation of the state from the control of the church, and to foster the development of that natural intelligence and morality which constitute the necessary and all-sufficient basis of secular government.

Inasmuch as the experience of the past has taught us that the time is unripe for the enforcement of political action, either through the instrumentality of present parties or the organization of the Liberals into an activ political party: thefefore

Resolved, That while we keep this steadily in view as the final work of the League, we call the attention of all auxiliary Leagues and of individual Liberals in sympathy with our general aims to sections 5 and 6 of of article III. of the Constitution, and urge them to devote their time and strength principally to the dissemination of natural intelligence and morality, so that, by the secularization of men and women, we may in time secure a party strong enough not only to demand, but also to enforce, the complete secularization of the state. In order to carry this out,

Resolved, That the Board of Directors of the League immediately establish the lecture bureau, as provided for in the Constitution for the purpose therein set forth, by the appointment, at their discretion, of a suitable person to act as a general agent therefor, with such compensation as they are warranted by the state of the treasury to offer.

WHEREAS, It has been claimed by some that the resolutions passed by the Congress of the League bound those who voted in the minority, as well as the majority, and virtually compelled the minority to withdraw from the League: therefore,

Resolved, That the following is declared by this Congress to be the permanent rule of this body: That resolutions heretofore or hereafter passed by the annual Congress of the League are no test of fellowship in the League but simply express the sentiments of those voting for them, and of the particular Congress of which they are a majority; that all who believe in the entire separation of church and state, whatever their views may be on other questions, are earnestly requested to unite with the Liberal League movement and work for its advancement.

WHEREAS, The New York State Freethinkers' Association, at its late annual meeting, held at Hornellsville, N. Y., passed a resolution to take out a charter as an auxiliary to the League, providing we approve of its resolutions, known as the "Watkins resolutions,"

Resolved, That as the permanent Constitution of the League is in entire harmony with the same, our secretary be instructed to issue the charter when so applied for by the officers of the Association.

These resolutions mark a new departure in League work, and will make the basis of the greatest practical effort of Liberalism in America. They were drawn by Mr. Chainey, and he was warmly congratulated upon the program they presented.

Immediately after the disposal of these resolutions Mrs. Dr. Severance, of Milwaukee, offered a resolution reaffirming the resolutions passed at the last Congress in regard to the repeal of the so-called Comstock laws. This resolution was passed with only two or three dissenting voices. It was felt that the previous resolutions had taken away the objection that had hitherto been made as to any such expression of opinion on the part of the majority, and that the rights and consciences of the minority, however small, was respected, and would not be compromised nor compelled to appear as publicly assenting to that which they might not approve.

Several other resolutions, which had been offered by members and referred to the Committee on Resolutions, were then reported back and read and recommended to be received, and committed to the auxiliaries for consideration. They related to many of the prominent reforms of the day, and especially presented the views of the Socialistic-Labor party, and the civil service reform with great force. These resolutions and the discussion on them had exhausted the afternoon session. As the ex-President, Mr. Wright, arose to leave the hall, the Congress rose and gave him three cheers, and his name was directed to be put at the head of the list of Vice-Presidents. "The old man eloquent" was visibly affected by these expressions of respect and gratitude.

Mr. Chainey, as Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, was requested to bring forward a resolution expressing the grateful sentiments of the Congress and of the Liberals of the United States generally to Mr. Wright.

The evening session was devoted to public speaking and music, by Mrs. H. S. Lake and Prof. Peck.

Mrs. Lake's lecture was entitled "The Higher Life," and was a grand vindication of the moral basis of Liberalism. The "law unto oneself" and the use and need of it, as against church and artificial morality, was never more clearly vindicated. The lecture gave great satisfaction and was heartily applauded.

The lecture of Prof. Peck was shorter and gave the scientific base of social life and morals, which he found in a very clear statement of positiv philosophy.

Owing to the occupation of the hall on Sunday forenoon the adjournment had to be made to Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock, P. M.

On Sunday the Congress assembled to hear Mr. Chainey's great lecture, or oration rather, on the clergy. For an hour and a half the audience were spell-bound by this magnificent effort. There was but one expression about it, and that was one of extreme admiration. It was an indictment, a conviction, an execution, and a replacement of the whole body of spiritual "black dragoons" of the celestial despot.

I will not try to epitomize. There is no doing anything satisfactory with such an effort but to hear it; let it be repeated in every city in the United States.

The evening session of Sunday was opened by Mr. Reuben Dailey, of Indiana, by an address replete with argument and anecdote on the conditions of Liberal progress. It was heartily applauded. The rest of the business of the Congress was then concluded by resolutions proposed by Mr. Chainey in honor and support of Mr. Bradlaugh.

A resolution in regard to the position of Governor Roberts of Texas, in refusing to appoint days of prayer and fasting, was also heartily approved.

Mr. Wakeman then came forward and delivered his Inaugural Address as President of the League. He held the attention of the largest audience that had assembled during the Congress closely for over an hour. The subject was "The Past, Present, and Future Work of the League." It is enough to say that this was generally conceded to hav been the best and greatest address Mr. Wakeman has ever made. He took all of the difficulties in hand with the confidence and skill of a master. Nothing in the past was excused or evaded. The history of the League, its successes and failures, was fully given; its present position was fairly estimated, and its future forecast in a way that inspired confidence and reasonable hope. Through it all ran a vein of humor that touched upon Mr. Abbot, Col. Ingersoll, and the Comstock difficulties in a way that removed them without irritation. All admit that it was a most masterly and useful discourse, one that will do very much to put the League upon a new, safe, and practical foundation. There was no word of disapproval. One of the leading seceders of last year was the most jubilant in his commendation, and the most radical repealers said that upon the ground taken by the new President "we can all stand, and all hatchets are buried."

The President at once came forward with the proposal to begin activ work then and there by taking contributions or subscriptions for the League, from the Leagues or individuals present—following up the work of the same kind which had been commenced the evening before. Mrs. Lake, the new chairman of the Finance Committee, took the matter in hand, and in a short time five hundred dollars were pledged and partly paid in. This was an earnest of success extremely gratifying to the officers for the ensuing year.

The press of Chicago referred to this generous response as the squeezing of a few "nickels" out of a reluctant audience. Let me say in this connection that the general treatment of the Congress by the press of Chicago was disgraceful in the extreme. Mr. Dailey and Mr. Wakeman gave the editors and reporters of the Lake City a terrible excoriation in their addresses. There was nothing that could be fairly said against the Congress, which was as orderly and as well conducted as any could be. Nothing that could be objected to as immoral or improper or extreme was said or done. The press could find nothing wherewith to illustrate its meanness except by reference to such trivial matters as the spelling of words by a copyist of the resolutions; and ridiculing the flowers presented by the ladies, which those chivalrous gentlemen of the West advertised as "prairie weeds!" When malice descends to things as small as those it is evident that it has become impotent merely from want of material.

The resolution of thanks and gratitude to Hon. Elizur Wright were now moved as the last act of the Congress, and were of course passed unanimously. The old Nestor of the League responded with allusions to his early connection with the temperance and antislavery reforms and his progress upward to the League. He was convinced that the world was gradually growing better, and that the League represented the greatest instrument in all real progress, all true reform. It was for that reasen that he had joined it and should continue to aid it in every way he could, and when he could do no more it should hav his last good wish, but not a parting blessing now, for he hoped to liv to see it prosper and be a blessing to the world many years yet to come.

Prof. Peck then gave a few touches of music. The President announced that the next Congress of the League would meet at St. Louis, one year hence, and the Congress then finally adjourned. There was a general feeling that this was the best Congress of the League ever held; that it meant harmony and work for the future. The delegates separated in the best spirit and with often expressed satisfaction that all internal dissensions were gone, and that there was no thought now but to find out what work each could best do for the League and its cause.

VERITAS.

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 4, 1881.

The following letter will explain itself:

CHICAGO, October 3, 1881.

DEAR SIR: The Fifth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League closed yesterday. It has been a perfect success. More auxiliaries sent delegates, and more attended than last year. All differences hav been reconciled and perfect harmony restored, without any sacrifice of principle on either side. Mr. H. L. Green returns to his connection with the League, and brings with him the heretofore independent New York State Freethinkers' Association, with its large membership of 1,200 Liberals. He will take a place of activ work in the League. George Chaney and other leading Liberals cooperate heartily with us.

The Board of Directors elected for the coming year are T. B. Wakeman, President, in place of Elizur Wright, who could no longer serve; T. C. Leland, Secretary; Courtland Palmer, Treasurer; George Lynn, of Lockport, Ill., Chairman of the Executiv Committee, in place of O. A. Phelps, resigned; and Mrs. H. S. Lake, at present of Elgin, Ill., Chairman of Finance Committee.

T. C. LELAND, Secretary N. L. L.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

A Tarry in London.—Concluded.

THE POTTERIES.

On the following morning Mr. Sale accompanied us to the pottery of Messrs. Minton, Campbell & Co., the largest in the vicinity, where I was highly interested in witnessing the various operations in the manufacture of fine queensware and China, from the mass of finely-mixed and kneaded clay, as it is formed upon the wheel, through all the processes until ready to be packed in crates. To witness the burning and molding of tea-cups, saucers, plates, platters, bowls, soup dishes, tureens, fruit dishes, pitchers, vases, ornamental ware of all kinds, is most interesting. It is curious to see the expertness with which the right amount of clay is guessed; how skilfully it is manipulated through all the various processes. Cups, bowls, etc., are made rather heavy, and after they have stood in the drying-room an hour or two they are put in a lathe and turned inside and out and brought down to the proper thickness and made smooth and even. The handles are molded and stuck on to the cup, pitchers, etc., very rapidly. Flower-making of clay and other ornamentation is more tedious and requires more painstaking. Roses, for instance, on large vases and flower-pots are made a leaf or petal at a time by bringing the clay to the proper shape, and stuck on where it belongs in the flower. Skilful workmen are required for such ornamentation. When the ware is sufficiently dried it has the first firing; that is, it is placed in large, heavy clay vessels, called seggers (usually twenty inches in diameter and one foot in hight), in which the ware is packed to the best advantage, so far as space is concerned, and the seggers are piled up in the kilns, one over the other, to the hight of twelve to fifteen feet. The kilns are circular in form, some fifteen feet in diameter, so that a great many piles of seggers are made in a kiln, after which they are fired up and kept at a white heat for four days.

When the ware is cooled down so it can be handled the seggers are taken out and the ware undergoes inspection. It is smoothed and sand-papered, and this raises a sharp dust, the inhaling of which is the most unhealthy part of the business, inducing pulmonary diseases of a painful kind, which shorten life so that few are able to follow it past the age of forty. With a view of lessening the pains in the chest, liquors are drank pretty freely, and the men often die confirmed sots, as well as diseased in the lungs. It, however, takes but a small percentage to perform this portion of the labor, and the rest of the work is quite healthy. After the first firing painting or ornamentation of the required kind is applied. One room is called the printing-room; here various designs and pictures on copper plates are printed on light, strong paper, and then the paper, ink side down, is placed upon the ware and rubbed down; the paper is then wet and removed, when the picture or design is transferred to the ware; and after again being baked, the picture is as permanent as the ware itself.

The painting department is a very pleasant part to inspect. Several rooms are filled with women and girls, sitting closely together at tables and busily engaged at painting in various colors flowers, birds, and other figures. The paints used are such as will endure the great heat to which they are to be exposed, and most of the colors are changed in the kilns, or ovens. These female artists by constant practice become very expert, and it is wonderful to see how rapidly they dispatch their part of the work. Tiles for floors are square tablets measuring about six inches each way and half an inch or more in thickness. These make a floor as pretty as if richly carpeted; they are largely used upon the continent, as well as for the inner walls of houses. In one room were forty of these artistic painters.

The glazing is a simple process; hardened silex or flint, the principle of glass, blended with a preparation of lead and other materials, are mixed in a fluid state and kept agitated, and into this the ware is dipped, and the great heat of the ovens fuses the silex, lead, etc., and the vessels are absolutely coated with glass.

The gilding of the finer ware is performed, I think, after all the other processes are completed, and the gold is applied in the form of gold leaf, a cement holding it only where wanted. Perhaps the ware is again baked after the gold is applied. Ware decorated with blue seems to be in style for the present, and the white ware, which for several years was so generally used, has been supplanted by the blue.

In the sample or display room—a room perhaps sixty by forty feet—I saw many of the most exquisite specimens of artistic work imaginable. Some of the larger pieces, like platters, tablets, etc., had on them beautiful paintings from classical and other designs. I do not know when I have seen anything so pretty. The kinds of ware and styles of decoration were almost innumerable. Some pairs of large plates and tablets sell for hundreds of dollars. The finer decorating of this kind of ware is done by male artists of the highest excellence.

This establishment is said to be the largest and finest in the world, and has taken the first premiums in several world's fairs or expositions; so when I had been over it I did not conceive it necessary to look at others of smaller caliber, when the process in all is practically the same. The number of hands employed in this establishment is some seven hundred, about equally males and females. In many cases, as in the whirl work, in the first processes each workman has a girl to assist him by treading the wheel, etc. I made the inquiry if irregularities and immoralities do not sometimes occur by the sexes being thus thrown constantly together, and was informed that illegitimate births are frequent, but that the young mother is thereby tabooed, disgraced, and oppressed. In this way is the injustice of mankind exemplified; the male escapes scot-free and suffers no permanent disgrace, while the affectionate, confiding, trusting, inexperienced girl, often the most innocent party, is made to suffer for life. When will men and women learn to be just and charitable to each other? When can the simplest demands and instincts of nature be answered without a life of cruel disgrace to follow?

In a radius of fifteen or twenty miles about Stoke and Hanley, the first having 20,000 inhabitants and the second 40,000, a large proportion of whom are potters, are scores if not hundreds of potteries, and it is estimated that fully 75,000 persons are employed therein. When trade and foreign demand are good the times in the potteries are good, and all hands are prosperous, but when trade is stagnant and foreign demand dull, hard times are the result. The extensive potteries that are in successful operation in the United States, particularly at Trenton, N. J., have of course had a tendency to lessen American demand for English ware, and have correspondingly affected the English manufactures. The manufacturers of England would be glad to have Americans engage exclusively in raising bread-stuffs and not engage in manufactures; but I have said to those I have conversed with upon the subject that a country of fifty millions cannot profitably engage in agricultural pursuits, and that the best interests of the country demand manufactures as well as agriculture; and that when both go hand in hand is the greatest prosperity attained. I say to my English friends that America will gladly supply England and other countries of Europe with what bread-stuffs and meats they require or are unable to produce, but they must not ask us to relinquish manufactures; for it is questionable whether an exclusively agricultural community can attain to the highest degree of prosperity. Manufactures are also essential to the greatest prosperity of any country.

In addition to the pottery interest of Staffordshire there are also many iron manufacturers, and as the country is also a fertile agricultural district the prosperity of the people has been secured, and vast fortunes by the few have been accumulated. The clay for the manufacture of pottery is principally brought from Cornwall, in the southwestern part of England, and is transported by canal, by vessels, to Liverpool.

After viewing the potteries sufficiently, we took a carriage and rode out three miles to Trentam to one of the palaces of the Duke of Sutherland, who owns a large proportion of the land in this vicinity. The palace is large, imposing, and costly, and is amply supplied with lodges, laundries, gardens, sylvan walks, and drives, the latter of the most elegant description, including hundreds of acres of beautiful grounds. Among the other luxuries which the Duke has to boast of is a church of his own, near his palace, so he is not dependent upon his neighbors for his religion; by having a priest of his own he can have all the religion he wants upon his own premises. He was not at Trentam, and the palace was not open to the public, so I did not see the inside; but did not feel extremely regretful about it, for I have seen the residences of kings and popes and was not made especially happy thereby.

The Duke of Sutherland is one of the largest landholders in the British realm, he being the owner of 1,300,000 acres, including a hundred thousand acres or two owned by his wife. Just think for a moment of the great injustice for one man to own a million and a quarter acres of land, while scores of millions of his fellow-beings, equally as good and as worthy as himself, are without a foot they can call their own. A comparatively few men have from feudal times engrossed to themselves the lands of Great Britain, and have prevented the masses from having any share in its ownership. The waters of the country are also similarly owned by a few, and a common man dare not fish for certain kinds of fish which breed in the streams of England unless by permisson of the owners. In the same way would the pure air of heaven be owned, and bottled up or kept in reservoirs, and sold to the masses at so much a breath, were the thing possible. There would be justice in a few men owning the air, and farming it out to those who wish to sustain life, equal to a few owning all the land and a portion of the water. All are equally gifts of nature, and all men have a birthright inheritance in each. It has taken a long time for mankind to become convinced of this great truth, and they have not yet learned it. When may it be expected that it may be generally accepted?

As great as the landed possessions of the Duke of Sutheriand are, he is not the wealthiest man in Great Britain. The Duke of Westminster, who, though he does not own so much land, has a far larger share of property in cities and towns, which pays an enormously higher rent, is vastly wealthier. The Duke of Sutherland, however, has a princely fortune, but, unlike many of the nobility, he has the credit of being enterprising and public-spirited, and engages in iron works, making of railroads, and works of that kind, thus giving employment to hundreds of people, and doing something to promote the general welfare. But it is hard to forget how grasping these lords and dukes are, and how through their agents the poor toilers are oppressed to the earth, and the last cow and the last pig often taken from them to pay the rent of a few acres—absolutely for the privilege of living. They might about as well own the air and sell it by the gallon as to make a poor tenant give all he can possibly produce for the privilege of eking out a wretched existence.

SHEFFIELD AND ITS IRON WORKS.

In the afternoon I took a train for Sheffield, via Derby, some fifty miles distant, as I wished to visit that busy town of Yorkshire, so noted for its manufactures of iron and steel, and the great multitude of articles from the same. The country along the route is of the same undulating, fertile, beautiful character for which England is so justly noted. Good farming land and well cultivated fields are seen on every side, with an iron manufactory of some kind at intervals of a few miles only all along, and more especially as Sheffield is neared. England, in fact, with much truth can be denominated one great continuous work-shop.

Sheffield is not a pretty town. It has beautiful plains in its vicinity, and the town itself was doubtless a pleasant place a few hundred years ago, before the disciples of Vulcan settled down here in such vast numbers, and before the constant smoke from hundreds of blast furnaces, smoke-stacks, and belching chimneys, made the city and locality a perfect hades of soot and blackness. I did not enter the town under the most favorable circumstances, it having rained two or three hours, the atmosphere being humid and oppressive, its hilly streets nasty and black, and an air of gloom like a pall hanging over this city of 285,000 souls. I spent the remainder of the day in looking up persons to whom I had letters as it had got to be too late to think of visiting th. manufactories; and in the evening to pass the dreare time away I visited the Alexandria theater, any witnessed a very fair company perform two piecesd one of which was ballet and operatic. I am struck, with the cheapness of amusements in this country; I think I paid but six bits for my seat in the Sheffield theater, and it was close to the stage and directly in front. In New York such a seat would not have been less than a dollar. In the galleries here, the admittance is sometimes but three pence.

Sheffield is supposed to have derived its name from the river Sheaf, one of the branches of the river Don, which flows through the town. A town has stood here many centuries, and a great deal of history, some of it of a bloody character, might be related if time and space were not so in demand. Many of the quaint old appellations of hundreds of years ago are still retained, so they still have in use such names as "Daisy Walk," "Pea Croft," "Bower Spring," "Balm Green," "Fig-tree Lane," etc., some of which now, with the black, grimy look which everything wears, seem a trifle out of place.

There are in Sheffield scores of heavy iron and steel works, and many manufactories of articles of iron and steel, including cast steel, Bessemer steel, Siemen's steel, armor plate, heavy ordnance, rifle-bands, shot and shell, railway engines, railway iron, buffers, wheels, springs, tires, axles, carriages, wagons, large steel castings for marine uses, engines, machinery, shafting, steel bells, scythes, sickles, mowers, reapers, wire of all sizes and kinds for ropes and hawsers for marine use, sheet steel for pens, bolts, nuts, boilers, engines, lathes, planes; drilling, boring, and slotting machines, saws, files, axes, adzes, hatchets, hammers; table and pocket cutlery of the most extensive character, with far too many articles to enumerate in full. Sheffield is a regular Pittsburg of a place, only a good deal more so. Such a din is kept up all along its manufacturing streets as to induce a very healthy respect for industry.

I did not propose to visit all the manufacturing establishments of Sheffield, nor half of them, as that to do them justice would require weeks of time. I proposed to visit some of the larger establishments, which give a faithful idea of the work done in the many others of lesser pretensions. After walking an hour or two among the manufacturing establishments, I made some effort to find Mr. Alfred Davis, one of the employees in the great works of John Brown & Co., and withal a very intelligent Liberal. He was busily engaged in repairing a large blast furnace, and could not leave the job to show me around. He sent me to a friend of his working in the rolling department of the works, but I was unable to see him, as upon application to the office of the works I was for the first time refused admission in an English manufactory. The person with whom I had an interview presented my card to the Chairman of the Board of Managers, but brought back word that their rule admitted none, unless bearing letters from some friend or patron of the establishment. I had no such letter, and whether good-looking or not, could not get in. It, however, seems to make some difference as to what kind of a man application is made to. I next went to the Cyclops works of Messrs. Charles Cammell & Co., on Saville street, which are of proportions as large as those of John Brown & Co., or any other in existence, and which had been represented to me as more difficult of ingress than Brown & Co's.; but upon obtaining an interview with Mr. A. G. Longdon, the very gentlemanly person in charge of certain parts of the business, and the one who has to decide upon the admission of visitors, he listened very courteously to my request, and though he said it was their rule to admit only such as brought letters from friends of the establishment, he readily granted me permission to look over the works, and sent an intelligent young man to accompany me and show me the different processes and departments. I was particularly anxious to see the manipulation of the heavy armor plates, which I had seen at Pembroke Docks, and the forging of large bodies of iron and steel.

Some idea of the extensive character of the Cyclops works may be had by the statement that they have been in operation some thirty years. They have establishments in Grinusthorpe and Penistone, besides those at Sheffield. Their works occupy over sixty acres, and they employ six thousand men. I will not attempt to enter into details in the hurried description which I have given, but will only mention some of the features which most interested me. As soon as inside, one seems lost in a labyrinth of huge apartments peopled by Cyclops indeed. The engines are working, the furnaces belching fire, the steam-hammers, large and small, forging out iron and steel in all forms and sizes, showers of brilliant sparks falling here, there, and everywhere, the large rollers crushing and bringing into proper shape large masses of heated iron, all attended with a bewildering din difficult to describe. The first large apartment attracting attention is the extensive file works, where files of all kinds are made, from two feet in length down to two inches, flat, square, three-cornered, round, half-round, and of all shapes in which files are made. They are brought into shape by small steel hammers, and then annealed and ground upon huge grindstones, and after this are cut with something like cold chisels. The better cutting is done by hand in the old way, and it is curious to see fifty men cutting in a single apartment, with what speed they work, and how rapidly they file and smooth a bar of steel with file teeth, and how accurately they perform their work. Several machines are in operation at cutting files, and they strike perhaps four times as fast as can be done by hand. The hand-cutting is much the best, as good workmen can judge of the softness or hardness of the steel and govern their blows accordingly. After cutting they are straightened as needed, when they are hardened by being dipped, when at a red heat, in a vat of brine. This process is performed very rapidly. Before the heating process, to prevent the sharp edge of the teeth being injured by the fire, the files are coated with ale-grounds. They are next taken to the finishing-room, where they are thoroughly brushed, and then dipped into lime-water to protect them from rusting, and packed for market. While the files are being cut they rest upon a block of lead, to prevent the newly-cut teeth being injured; but in the process a dust arises, which is very deleterious to the cutters by inducing a diseased condition of the lungs, hence file-cutting may be regarded as an unhealthy trade. The grinding is done under a large shed; and as the men work by the piece, from morn to night they may be seen sitting on a slender board, the end of which bears upon the file; and the expedition with which the work is accomplished is sufficient cause for wonder. A large grindstone five or six feet in diameter and seven or eight inches thick is often worn away in eight or ten days.

I will endeavor to describe the rolling of the heavy armor plates, for war steamers, which I had not before seen. I found that the vast mass of fifteen or twenty tons is not taken from the puddler and worked in its entire mass, as smaller quantities are done, but the mass is made up of scraps and small pieces heated up and worked to plates one, two, or four inches thick and of the requisite size. A pile of these plates, say two feet in thickness, are put together in a huge furnace, the three heavy front doors of which are raised with levers to admit the monster, when it requires several hours for it to be brought to the proper degree of heat. I did not see one of these masses put into the furnace, but had the good fortune to see one weighing nearly twenty tons taken out. When it was found to reach the right degree of heat, the furnace doors were raised, and a huge pair of tongs, which required ten men to manipulate, were brought into service. These were made to take hold of the huge mass at one end on top and bottom, when by a heavy chain and engine, the chain winding around a shaft, the vast body of iron at the welding heat was made to change its base. Slowly its great weight was dragged along on an iron car or carriage just the right hight to reach the rollers which were to crush and roll and weld the huge body; and the carriage looked strong enough to bear up a hundred tons. The engine was of coarse strong enough to deposit the heated twenty tons upon the car, when the tongs were removed, and nearly fifty men pushed and pulled the car (for some were before and some in the rear) down a gentle incline to the huge pair of rollers ready to receive it. The heat of the mass was so great that one man with a hose had to sprinkle the men and keep them wetted to prevent their clothes from burning. The momentum of the heavy body took it between the large rollers, and their force being irresistible, the mass was forced between them, lessening its thickness by a couple of inches. It was received by a car similar to the one used on the opposite side. The motion of the rollers was then reversed, and the mass rolled back again; and each time it passed through, the upper roller was lowered a little by screws above. Thus the twenty tons of iron were passed back and forward between those great rollers about forty times, welding it all thoroughly together and bringing it to about sixteen inches in thicknes and correspondingly increasing its length and breadth. The process required over half an hour. When the mass was forced through the rollers the momentum is calculated to send it away too far on the cars; this was prevented by a heavy chain holding the car from going more than the proper distance; and to cause the mass to be entered between the rollers the car was moved forward a little by "nipping" at its wheels with long bars for the purpose. Birch fagots were frequently thrown upon the hot mass just as it was passing between the rollers, to render it smooth, but they produced a great crackling.

When the mass was brought down to the desired thickness, which was ascertained by a guage, a very heavy chain with three huge hooks, the whole attached to a traveling carriage or crane overhead, was brought over the mass, and one hook put under the center on one side, and the other two hooks some two feet each side of the center on the other. The heavy traveling apparatus overhead, operated, I think, by hydraulic power, easily lifted the twenty tons of iron and placed it on an iron railway car which was awaiting it. Four powerful horses then drew the car to a turn-table, where it was directed to an immense hydraulic press, in which the still red-hot plate is made perfectly flat or given such a curve as is desired to fit any part of the war steamer for which it is designed. Each plate is intended for a particular part of the steamer and is shaped accordingly. This hydraulic press gives a pressure of 1,250 tons, which is quite sufficient to give even a large armor plate, while hot, by the introduction of blocks and bearings, the requisite form. When the heavy plate is sufficiently cooled it is put upon a kind of planer, where the edges are cut down square and true, the ends also in the same manner, leaving in the center on each end and side a jog or ledge of two inches, so that the plates will lap on to each other and the joint not be all the way through in a straight line. Holes are also drilled in the plate, through which bolts attach it to the vessel, and when fully completed the edges are painted white, the plate is numbered, with the name of the steamer for which it is designed, and sent away by rail. A portion of the heavy plates have a surface of two inches of steel attached to them by the steel being poured on in a fused state, heavy bars of iron being used to make a frame to prevent the steel running too far. I think the union is effected by the plate also being brought to a high heat.

BESSEMER STEEL.

The manufacture of this variety of steel has a department of the works by itself, and I was much interested in watching it for half an hour or more. I doubtless had read of the process of making steel by the Bessemer process, but had forgotten it. The pig-iron is first melted in an ordinary furnace, from which, by a trough, it is drawn, some four tons at a time, into what is called a "converter," which is something like a huge crucible, or retort, constructed of fire-clay, with an inner jacket, and pipes transversing it for the conduct of the air, which is the element used to blow out the dross and impurities of the metal. The "converter" is hung near the center on pivots, allowing it to turn down or up, as desired. The mouth of it is much narrower than the body, looking like a huge fish's mouth turned to one side, somewhat like a crook-neck squash or gourd, the whole being pear-shaped. When the molten iron is conducted into the "converter," which receives it by being turned down horizontally, the stream running into it like lava down the sides of a volcano, it then takes the upright position, with its mouth inclined toward the wall, and the engine is started, which forces a strong current of air through the molten mass in the "converter," and the way a stream of fire, blaze, and sparks rushes out of the "converter" and flies over the place is almost fearful to witness until one gets a little used to it. The rushing in of the air, the roaring which is produced by its action upon the highly-heated metal, the belching forth of the fiery flame and the torrents of sparks, which look as though they might set the world on fire, present such an effect as cannot anywhere else be produced, and are enough to make one's eyes open wide, if not his hair stand on end. The sparks are mainly dross and impurities of the iron, but the force of the air is so great that the metal itself is often blown out, but it is afterward gathered up and used again, so it is not lost. At the commencement of the blowing the blaze which rushes out is a brownish red in color; but as the process proceeds the color becomes lighter, till almost white; and then again, as the desired state is reached, it becomes of a deep orange color. The color of the blaze tells the workmen when the blast has performed its work, which requires from twenty to thirty minutes. Then the "converter" is turned down again, and half a ton or more of metal, called "spelter," from another furnace, is allowed to run into it. Just what this addition does I did not quite learn, but it has its office to perform in converting cast-iron into Bessemer steel. The "converter" is then emptied into a large "ladle," from which the steel is run into molds holding five hundred pounds or more of the metal, which, when cold, are known as ingots. These are again heated in furnaces, and, by means of a roller, brought into rails or any other form desired. For some purposes the heated ingots are subjected to the steam-hammers, which give them a tremendous pounding, and draw them into whatever size bars or bodies wanted. In the entire works over forty of these "converters" are in use, and 550 tons of cast iron are weekly converted into Bessemer steel and brought into all the forms desired.

The process of making cast steel or crucible steel is much slower and more expensive, it requiring some sixteen days to convert cast iron into first quality of cast steel. This work also has a department by itself. The smelting for cast steel is done in furnaces heated by charcoal, the fumes of which are absorbed by the metal, which carbonize it and convert it into steel. Cast steel is simply pure iron with the requisite of carbon united with it. The carbon is of a hardening nature, and imparts to the iron something like the hard quality of the diamond, which is pure carbon in a crystallized form. The metal is kept in the charcoal furnaces for eight or ten days. It is next subjected to a refining process which is called the smelting shop. The steel in broken fragments is placed in clay crucibles holding fifty to one hundred pounds each, and these are let down into a large furnace heated by coke. The furnaces are very long and may be said to be under the floor, with heavy plates over them. The crucibles are let down through round opening, and when the process is completed they are lifted out by muscular strength and poured into molds for ingots, which are again heated and drawn out by steam hammers into bars of such sizes and shapes as desired. The crucibles are short-lived, rarely lasting for more than three insertions into the coke furnace. The job is a very hot one for the workmen. The crucibles are made on the premises, and a set of men are kept busy in forming them.

The Siemens steel is prepared in another department still. The process, as described in my Scotland letter, consists in keeping the iron at a boiling heat for two hours, while by the Bessemer process a continued blast of air forces out the impurities, refining the iron into steel. In making cast steel the iron is kept for many days exposed to the fumes of burning charcoal and coke. The latter is much the hardest and is capable of being made more adamantine than the other kinds, but at a greater cost.

I could give much more extended details of the work done at this very extensive establishment, but perhaps I hav dwelt long enough upon the subject. I will dismiss the matter by giving the weekly products of this busy hive of industry. Of railway springs, 150 tons; railroad tires, 180 tons; hundreds of gross of files; best iron, including armor plates, 575 tons; Bessemer steel rails, 1,000 tons; crucible or cast steel for files, tools, and steel pens, telegraph wires, springs, shovels, propeller blades, etc, 400 tons. To perform all this work eighty-five steam engines, one hundred and fifteen boilers, forty-five steam hammers (some of them very large), twenty rolling mills, eighty-three cranes, including the traveling and hydraulic cranes, twenty-six converting furnaces, twenty-six planing machines, fourteen drilling, fourteen slotting machines, and twelve miles of railway are employed. A large share of the iron ore employed in this heavy establishment is brought from Spain. The proprietors of the works hav purchased extensive iron mines in Spain and work them themselves. Smelting of the ore by large blast furnaces keeps a certain number of men constantly employed. In the way of iron and steel manufactories it is unquestionably one of the largest in the world.

The celebrated cast-steel works of Jessup & Co., the steel from which establishment nearly every blacksmith in America has used, are located at Sheffield, but as they are a mile and a half away, and as

I had seen the process of making cast steel, I concluded not to go to them.

ROGERS'S CUTLERY WORKS.

The next place visited was the large cutlery works of Thomas Rogers & Co., where everything in the line of table and pocket cutlery is turned out of as good quality and in as large quantity as from any establishment in the world. The works comprise several buildings five and six stories high and divided principally into small rooms. The work is mainly small, and small rooms answer for the principal manipulations. Considerable of the work, like forging carving-knives, pruning-knives, and large blades of that character is done with light steam hammers, but all the small blades for pocket-knives, etc., are forged by hand, a particular workman being engaged on a particular blade, all being made alike, so that he becomes very expert in turning them out. It is interesting to pass from room to room, and from forge to forge, and see the numerous kinds of blades being turned out by the thousand, including razors, which are made in very large numbers. The springs for pocket-knives are cut out with a die punch, as are also the linings for knife handles. The grinding of the knife blades is an immense job and takes many men to attend to it. The process is much the same as grinding files, but requires more care. The stamping in blades of pocket-knives the places for the thumb-nail and the name of the firm occupies several hands. The tempering is another branch of the work to which certain workmen are devoted. The blades are first all tempered high, and then drawn by heating them carefully until by the color the right point is indicated. Next comes the polishing, while another set of workmen are getting out the different parts for handles. Ivory, pearl, bone, horn, and wood are used. Ivory is largely employed, and several men are engaged in sawing it up with fine circular saws into the multiform shapes and sizes required. The firm buys large quantities of ivory, pearl, and deers' horn. The price of the deers' horn is about $3.50 per hundred pounds, and the stock principally comes from Germany. The ivory is from both Asia and Africa, the latter yielding much the largest tusks, some of them weighing over one hundred pounds. It is worth about $18 per hundred pounds. The pearl costs fully twice as much. The stock of ivory on hand is large.

The common pocket-knives are put together with little care and are turned off rapidly; but the finer knives are fitted together with great care, each part filed and adjusted to its place; temporary rivets are used, and each part numbered so they can be taken apart and it can be told which parts belong to any given knife. The finest knives are handled some two hundred times in the finishing processes. Several men are employed in honing the knife blades and razors, and the celerity with which this part of the work is performed is very observable. In fact, as the work is nearly all piece-work, it stands each in hand to dispatch it as rapidly as possible. Following the same kind of work year after inevitably makes an active mechanic very rapid. The room where the razor handles are made is a lively one. Various materials for handles are used. Horn, in imitation of shell, is a large proportion. The mode of polishing is new to me. The polishing-wheel is made of muslin in round form, about eighteen inches in diameter, some hundred thicknesses or more being held only at the center. One would hardly think thin muslin so held would make a substantial polishing-wheel, but the rapidity with which it runs makes the thin muslin pieces seem firm like a board. Nearly a thousand hands are employed in the establishment.

Roger & Co. manufacture largely silver-plated goods of all kinds, but that is done in another establishment which I did not visit. I thought I had probably seen enough of Sheffield, and being rather weary made my way to the station. I had a pleasant three and a half hours to London, making but two stoppages in 160 miles, that being a pretty fair rate of speed. Our route lay through Nottingham, which from the railway looks like a very pleasant town. That was one of the points at which we stopped. The beautiful country is exceedingly lovely, it being in that direction about as pretty as any part of England.

I can inform you that in all my seeing I have not seen Queen Victoria, nor any of the royal family, and in fact none of the distinguished nobility. Vic. has been at Balmoral through the summer, and I think is there still. Wales and wife have been to Liverpool to attend to the opening of some very fine docks, and also at other places. The nobility are in various places seeking pleasure and trying to make life endurable. It matters little to me where any of them are, as I want as little of them as they do of me.

In this connection I will repeat an anecdote which is being told here. Several gentlemen were recently in company, and one of the number was boasting that he had been taken by a person in the West End for the Prince of Wales. He was feeling very good over the little incident, and congratulated himself upon his good looks that any one should mistake him for so distinguisned a personage as the Prince of Wales. An American in the company could not see that it was much to boast of, for he had himself recently been taken for a much more distinguished individual than the Prince of Wales. He spoke this with not a little indifference, as though he did not think the Prince of Wales amounted to much. The other became rather indignant and replied that the Prince of Wales stood about as high as anybody, and he did not know where a person could be found more distinguished. The American coolly insisted that he had been taken for a much more famous individual, but did not seem to care to tell who it was. The first speaker then urged him to tell who the person was that the American had been taken for, and others joined in the request, "Tell us who it was." "Why," drawled out the American, "I was walking down by Hyde Park the other day, when a man, coming up behind me and slapping me on the shoulder, said, "Jesus Christ, is that you?"

I will detain you no longer with this letter, but try to tell you of more that I have seen in my next. I am sorry to hear of the severe drouth in America, and of the destructive forest fires in Michigan. The drouth in the Western states means that many of you must suffer in consequence, and that your summer labor will be nearly lost. By the fires many again have lost their all, and quite a number their lives also. This is a saddening reflection, and awakens my deepest sympathy. Could my prayers be answered, prosperity would smile upon you all.

Good-bye, D. M. B.

London and Other English Towns.

LONDON, Sept. 18, 1881.

DEAR FRIENDS AT HOME: I will give you some account of my visit to the Woolwich Arsenal, situated on the south bank of the Thames, some nine miles from London Bridge. I am indebted for my admission into the extensive establishment to my friend Mr. Robert Forder, who was once employed there and has several friends still remaining there. None are admitted save upon a pass from the war office or indorsement of an employee in the establishment. Foreigners are not admitted at all, save by special permit from the Admiralty or the War Department; so for the time being I was regarded as a subject of Queen Victoria, and I took no pains to inform any one to the contrary. In Mr. Forder's company I passed very well for an Englishman, especially as I did not talk enough to expose the Yankee accent.

Let me tell you first that Woolwich is pronounced Woollege, the same as Greenwich is pronounced Greenege, and Norwich is Norrege; I will not undertake to explain by what process in pronunciation wich becomes ege, but it is sufficient for me to assure you that it does so become here.

The Woolwich Arsenal is decidedly the largest in the world. The grounds front more than a mile on the river, and comprise over three hundred acres, and fourteen thousand persons are employed in the works. The large area is inclosed by a strong, high wall, and is well covered with large, substantial buildings, for the manufacture of cannons of all sizes, from the small field-pieces, and those transported on the backs of mules, to the guns weighing eighty to one hundred tons. These last are truly monsters, being some twenty feet in length and over six feet in diameter at the breech, with a bore eighteen inches in diameter, the shot for which weighs 1,800 pounds. These cannons are made of steel, and are composed of scrap and other material that has been worked over several times. It is welded in round, flat sections of the size of the gun, with a hole for the bore, and some six inches in thickness. This mode of manufacture turns out a much stronger gun than making them of large bodies of metal. The larger guns must be composed of thousands of pieces of steel. Some ten or twelve of the sections, after being thoroughly welded, are put together, and brought to the welding heat in a furnace. They are then placed under a large steam hammer and welded into one mass; and section after section is added until the right size and shape are obtained. It takes a long time to build up a large gun, giving it the right size and proportion for the greatest strength for the weight of metal. Then the exterior has to be turned or planed off, and the bore has to be turned out to the correct size, after which the rifling is done, in a kind of lathe for the purpose. The rifling is a grooving of a slightly spiral character, so that when the shot is expelled it receives a turning impetus, which gives it greater speed and precision. All the ordnance made at this arsenal is rifled.

The manufacture of the bearing and apparatus for handling the guns is of course very extensive and perfect. The sighting of the guns and preparing them for accurate shooting is a particular part of the business, requiring the most accurate skill. The making of gun carriages for the navy and wood carriages for field artillery are distinct branches of the business. Putting together the very strong wheels for gun carriages is done by hydraulic power, a cylinder of the hydraulic press being placed at each spoke. The wheels are of the strongest oak, the hubs are of iron, and the spokes are pressed in with greater power and with greater expedition than they could be done in any other way. I noticed a dovetailing machine, for making the boxes in the artillery carriages, that works very perfectly and rapidly. There is a timber department where the hard and strong woods are kept. They are brought here in the whole tree and sawed by gang-saws in mills of the neatest construction.

The making of conical shot is also a very extensive branch in the arsenal. These shot are all sizes, from an inch to eighteen inches in diameter, more than four feet in length, and weighing 1,800 pounds. All the large shot are shells, cast with a chamber in the interior to receive the explosive charge, the place being afterward closed with a plug which goes in with a screw. The foundry for casting these shells is large and light, and undoubtedly the neatest foundry in the world. The most perfect order is maintained here and throughout the entire establishment. The floors of the buildings are of iron plates cast for the purpose, and are carefully and frequently swept. On entering the furnace building one is struck with the lurid glare of the molten metal streaming in cataracts from the furnaces, or in seething caldrons, borne from the huge reservoirs to the molds or cases where the molding is done. Many thousands of tons of iron have been here converted into death-dealing shell. In the large grounds next the river were huge stacks and piles of the shell all ready for shipment. There must now be thousands of tons all ready to go as soon as the order issues from the war department. The sight of so many shell, designed to destroy human life by wholesale, is enough to fill one with amazemement if not with horror.

Shells are made of hardened iron, or the outer surface is hardened by a patent process, so that they cannot be turned in lathes, but they are ground on large grindstones. Several holes are, however, drilled into each shell, and in these are put plugs of brass or some metallic composition, which are turned down in lathes to correspond with the rifling of the guns. The plugs project a quarter of an inch or more beyond the body of the shell, so it will be seen that the shell proper does not come in contact with the gun, but only the soft metal plugs, otherwise the rifling of the guns would soon be worn out by the cutting and wearing of the shells. The smallest shot have six or eight of these plugs at the right places, while the large-sized ones have three or four times as many. The charging of the shells with the explosives which are to burst them into fragments and scatter death and destruction round about is not done till after they are shipped to their destination, and not till just before they are used.

The small conical shot for the hand rifles are made of lead by machinery. The lead is forced by powerful hydraulic pressure through a die of the right size, and comes shooting out in a most singular manner. It is then cut up and pressed in shape and otherwise worked by complicated machinery made expressly for the purpose. The only round shot or bullets made in the establishment are lead balls for scrapnel, hundreds of them being placed in a metal vessel, which conveys them from the gun to where execution is to be done. I saw scores of these metal cases, some six inches through and twelve inches long, being filled with the leaden balls.

There are many large rooms filled with intricate and expensive machinery; one room of this kind is the largest I ever saw. I estimated it to be nearly a thousand feet in length by four hundred or five hundred feet in breadth, having five hundred lathes, slotting machines, etc., etc. This is indeed a busy room, and contains millions of dollars' worth of machinery. Other shops are very large, and the aggregate of machinery of different kinds is something immense.

There are brass as well as iron foundries for casting the many forms of articles in brass. The brass is melted in crucibles. The finishing of the brass articles is done in a department by itself.

The preparing of the cartridges is done in a series of buildings put up separate from the others, and visitors are not allowed to enter them. Even the employees who work in them are required to change their clothes and don an arsenal suit before they can enter the cartridge buildings. Every possible precaution is taken to prevent accidents. The best of chemists are employed in testing the chemicals for forming the explosives to be used in the work of death.

In the various parts of the grounds are captured cannon which have been taken in the various wars in which the nation has been engaged—some taken from the Chinese, some from the Indians, some from the Russians, and some from other nations. These are kept as mementos of the nation's prowess, though some of the pieces are of brass, or bronze, weighing many tons, and of great value. Here also rests the large fifty-ton gun which burst on the steamer "Thunderer" in the Crimean war, by which some twenty persons were killed. It was a great mystery what caused the bursting, whether from a flaw in the metal or because two charges had been inserted without firing. Hundreds of experiments were made with its companion gun, firing it with such rapidity as to cause the metal to be almost hot enough to set the powder on fire; then by a double charge of powder and double shot the second was also burst. So it was settled that the first gun burst from overloading. The broken guns lie side by side—a sad confession of the fallibility of even great guns. Here are also lying the six Parrott guns which the English government contracted for with Ericsson several years ago. Much sport was made in this country by the war department buying such guns. Ericsson sold them by weight, and he put in about three times as much metal as was necessary. They have never been used, and probably never will be.

I could not help thinking, while looking over this vast establishment, what a sad commentary it is upon Christianity and its peaceful teachings. Here the first Christian nation in the world has expended hundreds of millions of dollars, and is employing thousands of men constantly, to construct the most ingenious implements and inventions for destroying human life—the lives of men, too, who never did aught themselves to wrong the British government or people. Premiums are offered for those who can invent guns and other apparatus that will destroy the greatest number of creatures bearing God's image, and brother Christians at that. This killing and maiming has been kept up century after century since Christianity became a power. Although it boasts the highest civilization the world has known, its proudest achievement seems to be to kill the greatest number of human beings in a given time. I remarked that Christianity claimed to be a peaceful religion, but that it had proved itself to be more bloody, to provoke more hate, to take more life, than all the other religions among men. In spreading peace over the world Christianity has proved a failure. If war is ever done away with, and the nations study peace instead of war, Rationalism will have to effect it; Christianity will have to give way and a better religion take its place.

After seeing the Arsenal to our hearts' content, we called upon Mr. and Mrs. Martin, of Woolwich, a most pleasant, genial, and agreeable pair of Freethinkers. We stopped and took tea with them and had a very interesting visit. It is seldom one meets more agreeable people. Here I eat the first shrimps I ever tasted. For those who do not know any more about shrimps than I did, I will say they are a small fish somewhat in the shape of a lobster or crab, but about an inch and a quarter long. They are boiled, and usually skinned before being eaten, but it is a slow, tedious work, something like skinning beechnuts. They are sweet and palatable, and are quite a favorite here, where oysters are scarce and dear.

After this we crossed over the river to extensive pleasure gardens on the north side—a place of great resort. It is without the city limits, not subject to the ordinances of the city. People meet in great numbers there to enjoy music, dancing, and to partake of fluid refreshments, etc. Here we saw some thirty English girls from one of the interior counties busily braiding hats and bonnets of beautiful bleached straw. All parts of the processes were being represented, and some sales effected. The groves, shaded walks, and promenade grounds of the place are pleasant and extensive.

On another day I went with Mr. H. R. Smith to Epping Forest, eight or ten miles northeast of the city. The wood extends some ten or twelve miles north and south, and one or two east and west, and is a veritable forest. For centuries the public have had a sort of ownership in it, though it was virtually the property of the lord of the manor. It being a long time a sort of public property, and not of as much value as it has become of late years, many persons who owned land adjoining with impunity made depredations upon it by moving their fences upon it and taking ten, twenty, or fifty acres, according to their greediness and dishonesty. At first this sort of stealing attracted but little attention, and if the thieves retained peaceful possession for twenty years, then it became bonafidely theirs. In this way hundreds upon hundreds of acres were taken from the forest, and ultimately became private property. But at length, when the land became more valuable and the stealing became too open and extensive, serious objections were raised against this wholesale robbery, and many suits were commenced against those who had thus moved their fences upon the forest, and those who had not had it in possession twenty years were compelled to give it up, with whatever improvements they had made upon it. The government took it in hand and bought the forest of the lord who had a claim upon it, and devoted it to the people for a perpetual place for public resort, excursions, amusements, picnics, etc.; for school children, Sunday-school children, grown people, and whoever wish to go there. A hotel is kept at the edge of the forest, with a variety of accommodations for sports, such as swings and flying-horses. A railroad runs direct to the forest, and great numbers flock out there during warm weather for a day's amusement. Those who wish to walk through the woods have ample room to indulge in that direction, while those who wish to ride on horseback or in carriages have facilities to do so. The ground is level, and the surroundings are pleasant. The day we were there some two hundred and fifty ballet-girls and their dressers and attendants were out for a day's pleasure. We took dinner with them; and though they were lively and musical, they behaved very modestly and decorously.

On one day I made a trip per steamer down the river Thames, some sixty miles, to Sheerness at its mouth. It was a pleasant excursion, giving me an opportunity to see the towns that dot the river's banks all the way, and to view the vast amount of shipping constantly traversing its waters. There is no river in the world over which one half so much of the produce of the world, the wealth of nations, and the various articles of trade and commerce passes back and forth as on the Thames. One of the petulant kings of England once threatened the lord mayor of London to remove his court from London, to which the mayor replied, "Your Majesty may move your court wherever you please, but you cannot remove our river Thames." But as rich as it is in its burden of the world's wealth, one cannot help thinking what a foul stream it is, carrying the sewage of 4,000,000 people.

At London Bridge the river does not seem to be more than six or eight hundred feet in width, but it soon grows wider. At twenty miles down it is a mile wide, and it continues to grow wider until at Sheerness its width is nearly five miles. Hundreds of crafts, from the stately ocean steamer or the full-rigged ships to the small-sized sloops, are passing to and fro on its surface. Steam tug-boats are busily employed at towing up heavily laden sailing vessels, and when the freight is changed are ready to tow them back again. The amount of life and activity constantly being displayed on the Thames can hardly be realized by those who have not witnessed it. At different points are anchored the old men-of-war and three-deckers which half a century ago were the great dependence of Great Britain in maintaining her supremacy over the waves; but now iron and steam have superseded them, and they are set aside as training-schools for candidates for seamen and the navy—the indexes of the changing system of ocean warfare.

The banks of the lower Thames are not elevated; much of the way the country seems level and flat, but for perhaps half the distance a low range of cultivated hills loom up and bound the horizon some five miles away on either side.

Among the towns upon its banks are first Greenwich, then Woolwich, Rosherville, Gravesend, South End, and Sheerness, with some others whose names I have forgotten. At Sheerness the government has a naval station, where naval stores are kept, docks for the construction of war steamers, etc. The pier, however, was a quarter of a mile in length, and as the little steamer on which we made the passage stopped but fifteen minutes, no time was afforded to look into the merits of the town. At Gravesend a regatta was out, and some kind of row was on hand, but nothing of much importance. The docks are extensive, and must be to accommodate such an amount of shipping as comes to this port. New docks of the very best description have been constructed on a branch or extended slip on the north bank, and are capable of receiving great numbers of the largest vessels. The docks are of stone and will last for a thousand years.

I should have told you sooner than this that on the 2nd inst. Mr. Bridges left for the continent, to go over much the ground I did last year, while I remain here, and attend the conference when it comes off, see what sights I can, etc. I of course do not care to go over again the ground I did last year, while Mr. Bridges cannot afford to omit it. We will join again on the steamer, which is to take us from Italy to Athens, Constantinople, etc., when we will undoubtedly remain together the balance of the tour.

A TRIP TO BRIGHTON.

One pleasant morning I took the southern train to Brighton, one of the most pleasant watering places in the world. It lies on the English Channel, some sixty miles south of the city. The country along the line is of good quality, and farming seems successfully conducted. Brighton is a very pleasant, well-built town, situated on rather high ground and descending gradually toward the channel. It is evidently a town of fashionable resort for those who have a plenty of money. The town fronts on the Channel for nearly two miles, and the buildings are of an excellent character, tall and imposing. A large proportion of them are hotels, to accommodate the numerous visitors who resort here for six or eight months in the year. The winter season is said to be as good or better than the summer. This is the south part of England, and has a milder and decidedly pleasanter climate than many other portions. There are twice the number of pleasant days in Brighton in the course of the year there are in London, with but a small share of its fogs and mists. Many merchants who do business in London live in Brighton, and go up on a fast train in the morning and return in the evening—a pretty good distance to go every day to and from business. For this reason Brighton may be considered a suburb of London.

I noticed that one or two of the hotels are seven or eight stories high. Many of the buildings in Brighton have fronts for bow and projecting windows, with innumerable verandas, which give them a beautiful appearance. The sign, "Apartments to let," hangs out from many houses, showing that more people can still be accommodated.

The "Front" along by the sea, or the esplanade, is a beautiful place for promenading and driving, and it seems to be well improved; numerous gay equipages were out, making the best of a sunny day. I saw many hand-carriages, in which invalids and elderly females are drawn about by men, usually pretty well advanced in life. They are much longer and stronger than children's carriages. This mode of riding in public places is far more common in Europe than in America. Many persons were in bathing, apparently enjoying the sport, though as there is so little warm sun here the water must be rather cool. Hundreds of ladies and others were sitting on the beach, watching the bathers and taking the sea air. The ladies generally had some crotchet work or something of the kind in hand, showing themselves very industrious. Probably a hundred small row-boats and pleasure yachts were out upon the water, occupied by those who prefer a row or a sail. By the nets being abundant along the shore, considerable fishing would seem to be done here. At the east end of the town is an extended pier, on piles and chains, reaching out over thirteen hundred feet. It is wide enough for a double carriage-way, and at the end is eighty feet wide. Many resort here to lounge, gossip, take the sea air, and amuse themselves at low tide by throwing pennies in the water to see the urchins—"Jacks in the water"—which abound here, picking them up. The scramble is great, and it is sport, for those who have nothing else to do, to witness the scramble. The pugilist, Tom Sayers, who whipped John Heenan, lived here while a boy; he was a noted Jack in the water, and was athletic enough to get his full share of the pennies. He was afterwards a bricklayer, previous to his engaging in the rough sports of the fistic ring. The pier stands on four clumps of piles, 258 feet apart, driven into the solid chalk, which is the foundation here, and on them are towers of cast iron reaching to twenty-five feet above the platform, sustaining a roadway hung on chains by upright rods. This pier was begun in 1822 and cost $150,000, and perhaps $25,000 has been since expended upon it to repair the damages it has received from the ocean. The pier at the west end is more modern, and of course finer. This was constructed fifteen years ago. It has but about half the length of the east pier, but is much wider. It is constructed upon a foundation of iron piles screwed into the chalky bed of the sea, and upon them are based iron columns, firmly braced and tied together, which bear longitudinal girders of wrought iron, supporting the roadway, which is constructed of planking, covered with asphalte. The grand entrance from the esplanade is 265 feet wide, with ornamented gates and toll-houses; and beyond is an abutment 290 feet long and 140 feet wide, from which a broad flight of steps, and side-inclines for bath chairs and other wheeled vehicles, leads to the main portion of the pier, a promenade 560 long and 56 wide, with octagonal rooms and flat roofs reached by spiral stair-cases at regular intervals. The pier end toward the sea is 316 feet long and 140 feet wide, and is supplied with weather-screens and roofed seats, with glass on the back, so that the prospect is not impeded, while gusts of wind and the heat of the sun are guarded against. Beneath the pier-head are landing-places for passengers to and from steamers which call. Two thousand people have been on the pier at a time, and ten thousand have visited it in a single day. The admission is two pence. The band plays here every day. An object of interest on the pier is the small cannon fired exactly at noon by the action of the sun's rays, concentrated by a sun-glass. The west end of the town has become the most fashionable, and as a matter of course is far more visited than the old one at the east end.

Those who Kick Against the Inevitable.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say in this week's TRUTH SEEKER that the fourth annual congress of the New England Anti-Death League meets in Science Hall, 712 Washington street, Boston, Mass., Sunday and Monday, Oct. 23d and 24th, day and evening. J. H. Swain, Prof. A. P. Barnes, J. M. L. Babcock, C. M. A. Twichell, E. H. Heywood, P. A. Field, the spirit of President Garfield, and other citizens of the air and the earth are cordially invited to speak. Yours truly, Princeton, Mass., Oct 10th. E. H. H.

Mr. Green's Whereabouts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say to your readers that for the next month I will lecture and form Liberal Leagues in Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois, and obtain subscribers for Liberal papers. I can be addressed care of Willie E. Green, Otisco, Mich. H. L. GREEN.

IT costs but half a dollar for THE TRUTH SEEKER to a new subscriber for three months.

The Political Aspect.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your issue of August 20th appears an article under the above caption, written by Moses Hull, to which I would reply. I hold that no possible good can grow out of political or religious discussion unless we can impart and receive information founded strictly upon fact. The plain truth in most cases, and particularly when applied to the science of finance, tends to cement the people together and to mutual improvement, while distorted and unreliable statements produce the opposit effect, often stirring up bitter enmity and deluding the masses.

The Greenback party, and those who hold opposit views, hav food enough for discusssion in the financial history of the last decade without either party resorting to misrepresentation. Let us try, therefore, to unite upon the real issues rather than be divided upon imaginary ones.

Mr. Hull says, "When the Greenbackers commenced their agitation the Republicans had contracted the amount of money in circulation to about five dollars per capita." Now as this statement is the foundation upon which many of his most important grievances are based, let us see whether he is building upon the solid rock of truth or the unreliable quicksands of imagination.

Never for a single day during the last quarter of a century could Mr. Hull make the above statement good; the paper money alone in circulation in the United States has never fallen to five dollars per capita during the last twenty-five years.

In controversion of his statement I glean the following statistics from the official report of the comptroller of the currency for 1880, page 41, part first:

Date.	Population of U. S. by millions.	Aggregate currency in circulation, National bank and U. S.	National ba'k currency in circulation, including g'ld notes.	Currency per capita.

" 1880	50	704 804 006	342 387 336	14
" 1881	50	697 757 809	343 831 107	13

The above statement shows that the paper money alone in circulation has at no time during the last sixteen years fallen to $13 per capita, while the greatest inflation during that period was $21 per capita, which constituted almost the entire money circulating, as no coin worth mentioning was passed among the people until after the passage of the resumption act.

Now it is fair, however, to estimate the amount of specie doing monetary service at $250,000,000, or five dollars per capita, making the total available money of the United States over eighteen dollars per capita.

Again, Mr. Hull says: "But does not friend Lamb know that more than half of all our superabundant money is national bank money? . . . Does he know that they hav more money out now than they hav bonds deposited to redeem? Does he know that these same banks could at any time, on ten days' notice, by a concerted action, withdraw their own seven dollars per capita of money, now circulating among the people? And does he know that that would bring immediate financial ruin? Is he willing to put the welfare of this whole country into the hands of a corporation whose interest it is to bring ruin to the masses and thereby enrich themselvs?" I think Mr. Lamb or no other person can know these statements to be correct. It is not true that more than one-half of all our superabundent money is national bank money, and this statement cannot be made good by Mr. Hull until the Greenbackers drive all the gold and silver coin out of the United States, amounting to more than one-third of the entire money in the country.

It is not true that the national banks hav more money outstanding than they hav bonds deposited to redeem, and this never has been the case since the organization of the national system.

The strong insinuation in the above that the security of the national bank currency has been impaired by the surrender of a part of their bonds is mischievous and tending to mislead the people. The facts are that in every case where the government has taken up the bonds owned by a national bank, and held for circulation, they hav been replaced by other bonds bearing a less rate of interest, or if sold the proceeds are paid over to the bank only so fast as their currency is surrendered to the government, always holding in reserve at least one hundred and ten dollars collateral to every hundred dollars of bank circulation.

Again I refer to the comptroller's report for 1880, page 30, part 1:

Date.	U.S.b'nds held for circulation by the gov- for the banks.	U.S.b'nds held for other purposes.	Grand total.

It is not true that the national banks could at any time, on ten days' notice, by a concerted action, withdraw their whole circulation. Not even one bank among the two thousand now in existence could do anything of the kind within so short a period. In almost every instance, when a national bank has attempted to call in their circulating notes, it has taken years to accomplish that object. It is not true that such concert of action on the part of the banks (if possible) would enrich them while it ruined the masses. When the masses are financially ruined the banks quickly fall in their wake; deposits are withdrawn, bills discounted fail, and the banks are impoverished, but never enriched.

There are now in existence over two thousand national banks, scattered over the whole country, located in almost every state, county, and city in the union; they are controled by over fifteen thousand directors, of every political and religious stripe; their stockholders are much more numerous, and are found largely among our poor and middle classes. Thousands of the national bank shareholders will truthfully testify that their bank stock is by no means among their best paying investments; that they subscribed originally for the stock in many cases to improve the general business of the country and to accommodate the people in the town where the bank is located. Thousands of such shareholders and directors will also say that there can be no pecuniary advantage to them to engage in any conspiracy tending to financially ruin the masses. The bugbear cry of the inflation orators that some day the national banks will, by a concerted action, try to pull down the temple, Samson-like, upon their own heads, is simply ridiculous. The bankers, as a class, are neither knaves nor fools; they could not do such a silly suicidal act if they would, and they would not if they could.

The claim made by Mr. Hull that the Greenback party has restored financial prosperity to our country is about on a par with the claims of the orthodox churches that they liberated the slaves. During the early days of antislavery agitation, when such pioneers as Gerritt Smith, Samuel J. May, Lucy N. Colman, and hundreds of others were publicly mobbed, egged, and burned in effigy, and otherwise insulted by the rabble for daring to raise their voices in opposition to the monstrous crime of human slavery, the church and the clergy, as a unit, in every Southern state, publicly sustained the system, while in the North, if they did not assist the rioters, they failed to giv sympathy and protection to their victims. It is a long story, with which the average reader is well acquainted. At last the slaves were set free, and to-day the orthodox people in every section of the country freely boast that they did it, and nearly every upstart of a young priest in the land is ready to swear that the great sin of American slavery was washed out by the blood of the Lamb.

Our great financial troubles began with civil war, and kept even pace with the creation of public debt and an unhealthy expansion of the currency. Contraction or repudiation was the inevitable result of such expansion. Government debts, like individual ones, must be paid or repudiated. All conservativ people hav advocated the payment of the public debt as fast as it was practical, while the Greenbackers hav continually demanded an increase of irredeemable currency. The true economists braved all opposition and passed the resumption act, which brought our depreciated, indefinit government promises on a par with gold and strengthened our national credit at home and abroad, while nearly every Greenback orator and inflation writer in the land raised his voice against the bill, demanding its immediate repeal.

While the real economists, headed by John Sherman at the Treasury, were fast paying off the principal of the national debt and every day reducing the rate of interest on the balance, the Greenbackers, led by General Weaver, were haranging the people with wild inflation schemes, which, if carried out, would financially ruin the nation in a twelve-month. And now, after the great evils attending a depreciated currency hav passed away, and prosperity on every hand has been restored to our beloved country through the sound practical financial action of the Republican party, it is amusing to hear the few remnants of the defunct Greenback party raise their voices and exclaim: "We are the great financial reformers who brought order out of chaos; we are the party who strengthened the government credit from its lowest ebb. It was our advocacy of the further inflation of an irredeemable currency which brought our depreciated greenbacks at a parity with gold coin, and we, the few defeated members of the dead Greenback party, deserve all the credit of saving the nation." John W. Truesdell.

A Plea for Organization.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Now that all differences between the Liberals of the United States hav been amicably arranged, and the National Liberal League has adopted a standing rule that in the future no one is to be responsible in the least for the opinions of others, and that there is to be no test of fellowship in the League further than that all shall be in favor of the total and complete separation of church and state, we should all go to work in earnest for organization.

In the first place, I think the Liberals of every state should be organized into one body. And I know of no name more appropriate for them to take than the name "Freethinkers." That word, better than any other, will include all classes of Liberals. The Materialists, the Spiritualists, the Free Religionists, and the Liberal Christians can all consistently adopt the name "Freethinkers." It was for that reason that the New York State Association took on that name, and its doing so, I think, has greatly contributed to its success.

And I would like to see every state in the Union, during the present fall or during the winter, form a similar organization, so that during next fall nearly every state may hold a Freethinkers' convention. And then let each of these associations take out charters as auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and be fully represented at the next annual congress, to be held in the city of St. Louis. And here let me giv your readers the "Articles of Association" under which the New York Association has so greatly prospered, and I would recommend it to the consideration of our Liberal friends in other states who desire to organize:

The name of this association shall be "The Freethinkers' Association of the State of New York."

OBJECTS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

First. To stimulate free thought and investigation among the people in relation to their civil, religious, and political rights, and encourage the investigation of questions relating to religion, science, and reform; and to that end sustain Freethought speakers, hold Liberal meetings, and circulate Liberal, scientific and reform papers and periodicals.

Second. To act as an auxiliary to the National Liberal League in its efforts to accomplish the total separation of church and state, and to organize local Liberal Leagues in the counties above named, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the National Liberal League.

THE CREED OF THE SOCIETY.

"Universal mental liberty."

PLATFORM OF PRINCIPLES.

The Platform of Principles is the "Demands of Liberalism," viz:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a textbook, or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States, or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oaths in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States, and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

MEMBERSHIP.

Any person may become a member of this society by signing these Articles of Association and paying twenty-five cents.

THE OFFICERS.

The officers shall be a President, one Vice-President from each county, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, and a Treasurer; also an Executiv Committee of seven, who shall hav the general supervision of the Association. The duties of the officers shall be those usually pertaining to these positions with the additional duties hereinafter mentioned.

The Vice-President of each county shall, immediately after his election, appoint two other persons of the county to act with him, and the three shall be the Freethought and Liberal League Committee of the county, the Vice-President to be the chairman, and it shall be his duty to notify the Corresponding

Secretary of this Association who his associates are when they are appointed. The duty of these county committees shall be to carry out the objects of this Association, and also to co-operate with the National Liberal League in all practical ways.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The officers of this Association shall be elected annually, and shall hold their positions until their successors are elected. The President shall hav power to fill vacancies.

AMENDMENTS.

These articles may be amended at any regular meeting of the Association by a two-thirds vote of all members present.

MEETINGS—WHEN HELD.

The annual meeting and all other meetings of this Association shall be at such times and places as the Executiv Committee shall direct.

Friends, everywhere, now, while we are stimulated by the wise and liberal action of the late Congress of the National Liberal Leage held in Chicago, let us in every neighborhood and vicinity go to work and organize auxiliary Liberal Leagues. And let us resuscitate and set to work all the auxiliaries that hav been inactiv and dormant for years past. And every one who has a dollar to spare for the Liberal movement should at once send it to Courtlandt Palmer, of New York city, the Treasurer of the National Liberal League. As Mr. Wakeman said at the Congress, every hatchet has now been buried, and let no one of them be dug up only as they are needed to fight the enemies of Freethought and state secularization. This last suggestion can't be too carefully complied with. There will probably be a few so-called Liberals who will not be inclined to be harmonized. Some of them may still desire to keep up the fight; but, friends, if there be any such let them hav the fighting business all to themselvs, and they will soon tire of it. Our time can be much better occupied in organizing for practical work. It has been decreed that before the next annual Congress we hav five hundred working auxiliary Liberal Leagues. To bring that about will require money and labor and zeal in the cause. If we are to hav any strife, let it be one among the several states as to which shall do the most in the work of organization according to its population.

H. L. GREEN.

P. S.—Friends will address me at present at Otsego, Mich. I shall not object to any one sending a stamp or a dollar in his letter.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO 54.

596. If I am constrained to admit the God of infinite knowledge and truth found it necessary to write a book for the guidance of his offspring in this world, and the books composing the Jewish scriptures make up the volume, I cannot easily admit that he would select a language to write his book in so imperfect as the original Hebrew was—a language made up of consonants without vowels or punctuation points, every letter of which had some four meanings, and was extremely liable to be misunderstood, even by the best judges. Simon, in his "Critical History," says: "It is unquestionable that the greater part of them [the Hebrew letters] are equivocal, and their signification utterly uncertain. Even the most learned Jews doubt everything about their proper meaning." Bishop Marsh uses such language as this: "The Old Testament is the only work which remains in the ancient Hebrew, nor have we anything like a lexicon or glossary composed while it was yet a living language." Another learned Hebraist says: "No two translators would agree in rendering any verb from the Hebrew." The learned Sir Godfrey Higgins said: "I am quite certain I shall be able to show—to prove—that every letter of the Hebrew language has four and probably five meanings;" while Smith, in his Bible Dictionary, says: "The translators are often misled by the similarity of Hebrew words. In very many cases the errors may thus be traced to the similarity of some of the Hebrew letters." Le Clerc, in a similar vein, says: "The learned merely guess at the sense of the Old Testament in an infinity of instances, which produces a prodigious number of discordant interpretations." Father Jerome makes a very similar confession: "When we translate the Hebrew into Latin we are sometimes guided by conjecture." To show to what length this guessing has been carried, a few instances will suffice. In regard to the kind of wood of which Noah is said to have built his ark, numerous different translations were made. One rendered it gopher-wood; another made it cedar; another juniper; another box-wood; another the Persian pine, another ebony. Dr. Geddes affirmed it to be wicker-work, while Dr. Dawson contended for bulrushes daubed with slime. Cooper says: "Up to the fifth century the Hebrew language was utterly destitute of any method of punctuation, as well as void of vowels—a mere mass of words without order or system. To ascertain the true signification was next to impossible." He further quoted the learned Du Pin to this effect: "The Hebrew alphabet is composed of twenty-two letters, as well as those of the Samaritans. But besides these letters, none of which is at present a vowel, and by consequence they cannot determine the pronunciation, the Hebrews have invented points, which, being put under the letters, serve instead of vowels. These vowel-points serve not only to fix pronunciation, but also give the signification of a word, because the word being differently pointed signifies things wholly different." All these things being so, I cannot believe that a God of all knowledge and truth would in the first place get up such an imperfect language to use himself or for others to use, or adopt it if others had gotten it up, for the purpose of making known his will to the children of men. There is quite too much imperfection about it for me to believe that the God of strict accuracy had aught to do with it.

597. There is much that is very impossible and hard to believe in the Jewish story. I cannot think it true that in the lifetime of one individual, Shem, who lived two hundred years after the birth of Abraham, the earth should progress from an uninhabited condition to the founding and peopling of nations like Egypt, India, Persia, China, Chaldea, etc. When Abraham is said to have gone down into Egypt he found a populous nation, with cities, a king, and staple government; the pyramids were then built, the obelisks were undoubtedly erected, and the country had reached a profuse population, and a high state of civilization, and the other countries named had done the same; but it is very improbable that this could all have taken place, from the very beginning, in the lifetime of Shem, nor even in nine generations, which is the number the story gives, could all these things have occurred. Populous nations and civilizations in different parts of the earth could not have been built up in that short space of time; nor could the races and colors of mankind, starting from three persons, have become so diverse and distinct as they now are, and as they must have been in Abraham's time. According to the hieroglyphics and inscriptions on the ancient Egyptian temples and monuments the Ethiopians were as marked in color then as now. It is impossible that this could have occurred in the lifetime of one man or in nine generations. There is certainly some mistake in the story.

598. It is again very hard to believe that in the comparatively short time that Jacob and his descendants remained in Egypt—215 years—they could have increased from seventy persons to between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 persons, which is the number they must have reached in order to have turned out 600,000 warriors, as the Bible story states. Such an increase in population would surpass anything ever known in the world, necessitating, as has been estimated, that every woman should be the mother of forty children, and that none should die before rearing a family of the same size. The thing is utterly impossible, and would have been though their stay in Egypt had been twice, three times, or four times as long as the period named. The story must be untrue. Rabbits or rats could scarcely have increased so rapidly.

599. It is impossible that a people numbering two or three millions, including men, women, and children, and their cattle, provisions, and luggage, could have been so handled as to have been marched out of a long, narrow country like Egypt in the space of one day's time. A like moving of such a body of people was never known in the history of man.

600. Of course I cannot believe that the Red Sea opened its waters for the 3,000,000 of the children and their cattle to pass through, standing like a wall on either side of the passing multitude, leaving a dry roadway for the people to walk upon, and as soon as the sons of Jacob had passed by rushed back and overwhelmed the Egyptians, drowning every man of them and every horse upon which they rode. This story is too remarkable; the events described are too improbable, too much in opposition to the experience of mankind, for me to believe they ever occurred. Of the same nature is the account of the parting of the Jordan, when after their wanderings in the desert for forty years the river kindly opened, the water damming up on the upper side to let the vast concourse of people pass safely over. It is much easier to tell such stories a thousand years after the time when it is claimed the events occurred than for them to be true. It will require for me better proof that such things took place than the unsupported story of an anonymous writer of whom no one knows anything. Of course many believe such stories very easily, but it only proves their credulity extremely large.

601. I cannot believe that a diminutive mountainous country like Judea, a hundred and forty miles in length, with less than an average width of forty miles, should from a semi-savage condition advance during the reign of a father and son so as to become a powerful nation with immense revenues and a large army, able to place 1,570,000 warriors in the field, with such an accumulation of national wealth that a single building—their temple—should cost $248,000,000, which is the estimated value of the 8,000 talents of gold, and the 17,000 talents of silver said to have been used on that one moderate-sized building one hundred and ten feet in length and thirty-six in width, David claimed to have provided for the purpose 1,000,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000 talents of silver, equal to $4,300,000,000, a third more than the national debt of the United States, while the entire domain in which this immense revenue was raised is but a little larger than the small state of Delaware. This story is too preposterous, too unlike the experience of mankind, to be worthy of belief.

602. I cannot think that a people occupying so small a country could engage in civil war and turn out such immense armies that one side could sustain a loss of 500,000 men on a single day and in a single battle. The like was never heard of in any other country, and it is very clear that such a small sterile country could not sustain such armies. The story cannot be true.

603. I cannot think that a country lying at the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, within two days' sail of the principal cities of Greece, at that time one of the most intelligent countries in the world, should abound in such wealth and magnificence, be able to raise such armies, amass such revenues, and erect such a temple, and the other nations of the world know nothing about it. Although it is claimed that the fame of Solomon spread all over the world, and that the people from all the kings of the earth which had heard of his wisdom came to him, still not a historian of India, Persia, Chaldea, Egypt, Greece, or Rome knew anything of it, or had a word to say about it. Through Herodotus, the greatest individual of his time, three times visited Syria, of which Palestine formed a part, he knew nothing of the glory of Jerusalem, nothing of the magnificence of Solomon, nothing of that wonderful temple, nothing of the immense armies of the Jews, and nothing of their great revenues and wealth. This is a pretty strong proof that they did not exist. Neither did Homer know of such a people; neither did Solon, though a great traveler; neither did Xenophon, Borosus, Sanchoniathon, Manitheo, Diodorus, Strabo, nor any of the historians of other countries. Had such a wealthy, magnificent people dwelt on the eastern end of the Mediterranean, within a short distance of their country, it is most singular that none of the historians named, who lived contemporaneously, should know nothing of such a people and have not a word to say of them. All the world has in reference to the wonderful stories of Jewish people is what some unknown person, hundreds of years afterward, saw fit to state. Those can believe it who choose to.

A Fool in His Folly.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A little snipe by the name of Kellerman, pastor of the first Methodist Episcopal church in this city, got off the following delicious absurdities on the occasion of President Garfield's funeral. He said the prayers offered up for the late President's recovery were not without effect, because Garfield got better several times. It seems a fair inference that if our praying Christians had worked a little harder, or if the Infidels and nothingarians had only taken hold and helped to turn the crank, Garfield might hav pulled through altogether. This is an application of Prof. Tyndall's celebrated "prayer-guage" idea, which, I am sure, though the subject is a sad one, would amuse that distinguished scientist immensely.

Kellerman also said that the Lord had answered our prayers by making Garfield's death a blessing in sundry ways. One of these ways was as a rebuke to Infidelity. Bob Ingersoll had been getting a hearing. But when this eminent Christian lay dying, no one turned to Bob Ingersoll for comfort.

Now to begin at the beginning, it is well known that the sect to which Mr. Garfield at one time belonged has always been considered on the extreme verge of Christianity. The so-called Disciples, or Campbellites, hav no creed. They are only a society of moralists, who regard Jesus of Nazareth as their founder, and immersion as a form of initiation which he established, and which, therefore, they do not feel at liberty to dispense with, though it is clearly more suited to Palestine than America. There is nothing in their customs incompatible with Arianism, Socinianism, or Universalism. They utterly reject the doctrin of original sin, which is regarded by both Catholics and evangelicals as the true cornerstone of Christianity. The chief cause of their success in this unbelieving age is that they combine simple Deism with a slender appearance of reverence for Jesus and the Bible.

But besides this, it is very doubtful if Garfield died a Campbellite. During his long illness, though conscious to the last, he never received the communion, never had any professor of religion pray with him, never is known to hav prayed for himself, made no allusion to religion, and manifested no particle of interest in the prayers which millions were offering for him. These are facts. The true explanation is unknown, but the current one is that Garfield and his wife, like thousands of reflecting people, had reconsidered their views during the last ten years, and were not, when he was shot, to be reckoned Christians in any sense of the word.

It is funny, too, that while harping so much on the doubtful Christianity of Garfield, none of them hav anything to say about the unquestionable Christianity of his murderer. Garfield perhaps was not a Christian, but there can be no doubt that Guiteau was. There was nothing vague about his doctrin; he had satisfied the most orthodox societies. Since he shot Garfield a clergyman has uncharitably called him a hypocrit. But I don't believe he was one. Hypocrits don't throw away their own lives to kill men who never injured them. Fanatical, bigoted Christians like Ravillac, Guiteau, and Damiens often do. Guiteau seems likely to die as game as Damiens. True, he does not fancy being roughly seized by a mob, but to be hanged according to law was what he expected, and he is sustained under the prospect by unshaken faith.

Guiteau, like many Christians of small caliber and large ambition, wanted to meet Bob Ingersoll in debate. Of course, Bob had other things to do than meet him. But they met at last. When Garfield lay bleeding and prostrate on the floor of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad station, and the assassin who had fired two shots was about to discharge a third, a man, not near enough to arrest the murderer's hand, prevented him from finishing the deed by throwing himself between them. That man was Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the same whose well-known abhorrence of bloodshed has led some abject Christian libelers to insinuate that he was a coward. It strikes me that Bob did quite as much as Jesus ever did for Garfield.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Oct. 3, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find draft for $10—$3 of it to lengthen my subscription to January 1st, $2 of it for pamphlets, $2 of it and my love to dear sister Elmina (remember, there is only one Elmina), $2 of it and my love lso to good Mrs. Chase (blessed woman) for the Physiologist for one year, and the other dollar is yourself to pay for the trouble I make you. I hope brother Liberals will be prompt paying subscriptions and help the office all they can by ordering books and tracts for distribution. I tender my best wishes for your success.

SAMOS PARSONS.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., Sept. 25, 1881.

O THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find stamps to the amount of $2, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been without it for two whole weeks, and I must confess that I feel lost without it. There is a something about it that causes me to watch anxiously for every number, and, like Rachel of old, "would not be comforted because it is not."

I am not situated where I can hav access to all the books necessary to learn of many things I should like to in order to meet our adversaries as I should wish. Will some one of your readers versed in or having access to the histories of Egypt, Persia, Rome, and Greece please inform me if in either of them there is any mention of Solomon's temple? I hav made the assertion that there never was such a building as Solomon's temple, and advanced in proof that in the histories of the above nations no mention is made of such an edifice. Had it existed, and of such dimensions and magnificence, the people of these countries, merchants and others traveling to and fro, would hav made some mention of it, and, it being such a wonderful structure, it would hav certainly received some notice in their history. Does the Persian history ever mention anything regarding the Jewish captivity, the destruction or conquest of Jerusalem, and destruction of its building or temple? Am I correct in asserting that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John are not Hebrew or Jewish names? If not, is it not singular that the names of the four leading books of the New Testament—the four evangelists, of reported Jewish origin, and having reference to the Hebrew people almost entirely, should be under the necessity of going outside of their own people to obtain suitable names for their books, or rather that God had to go outside of the Jewish people to get names suitable for leaders for his books? Also are not all Christians that expect to go to heaven loafers and bummers, and carry more assurance than a ward politician to ask God to take them to heaven and board and clothe them through all eternity for the contemptibly small amount most of them ever advanced toward the expenses of their keeping? If the majority of them would not hav to beat their way from the first week, I am mistaken in my estimate of the outfit generally.

How about the efficacy of prayer now? Should not thinking men connected with th Christian churches become satisfied on the point of prayers? If ever people offered up fervent prayers, the friends of James A. Garfield did. With such a test case as that must hav been, I think all should be satisfied that God has nothing to do with either presidents or paupers. What nature fails in, God has no business with. Truly yours, D. D. LAKE.

CHENEY, WASH. TER., Sept. 20, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I send you post-office order for $10.80—$5.80 for books, and $5 from D. C. Lewis for around-the-world fund. Cheney is a new and beautifully situated town, on the N. P. R. R. line, started just a year ago, and has now nearly five hundred inhabitants. A mill, academy, furniture factory, and large stores are here, not the least being my millinery store. There is a Methodist church here, and a Catholic and Congregationalist are being erected. I would rather see a Liberal hall than these temples of superstition, which some half-way Liberals are helping along. They will not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it is too radical. I hav induced many to read it by showing how much space was given to a Christian argument. Dr. J. L. York missed a good field on his late lecturing tour through eastern Washington Territory and Oregon in not coming to the two wonderfully thriving towns on the frontier—Cheney and Spokan Falls. I think my letters to him miscarried.

Our local paper is rather Liberally inclined. I got a notice of Mr. Bennett's trip around the world, with price of book, published, and this week Isaac Paden's synopsis of Ingersoll's and Black's argument. I hear the Methodists are grumbling considerably about it. They prefer abuse to argument.

Mrs. Duniway, lecturer and canvasser, organized the Woman's Suffrage Association here in July. She toadies to the church and popularity too much, but is sound and unanswerable on equal rights. She has done great good by her paper and lectures. Her enemies complain of her combativness, forgetting their constant taunts make her so. The Fourth of July Committee, ashamed to sign their names, published a malignant and abusiv complaint containing three falsehoods three weeks after she had gone home to Rutland. I got twenty of the best citizens to sign a protest against it, so that the spiteful complaint of two or three male opponents of equal rights should not pass for the sentiment of intelligent Cheney.

We Liberals ought to help poor Mrs. Churchill, West Richfield, Ohio, who has lain nine years with spinal disease, and has now a chance of probable cure if only means to pay a skilful doctor can be got. I shall try to sell her pretty badge. Please send me some show-bills, that I may act as agent.

Ever yours, ANNIE EVEREST.

NORD, CAL., Sept. 18, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: It is not often that I ask for some space in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but as you are the radical Liberal's best friend I must intrude on your kindness to demonstrate a few facts, therefore you need not expect any rhetoric. Nord, the burg which I call my present home, is a town in Sacramento valley. Its female inhabitants, those of the neighborhood included, are all good Christians. There are, however, among the men several Infidels, yet none outspoken but one or two besides myself. The rest of the males, at least all the intelligent ones, are Theists, though a great many of them attend church either for the sake of preventing their wives from falling into hysterics and to preserve the peace at home, or for fear of becoming unpopular with the orthodox religious people. There are, women and children excluded, not a half dozen sincere Christians in this district, so you will be surprised to learn that it requires three divine impostors to prepare that little flock for their hereafter. One of the three usurpers of the name of Christ and dragomans of Jehovah, on whom Mother Nature bestowed a Herculean frame, a great deal of cheek in place of brain, and who prefers idleness to industry, possesses no more conscience than a Neapolitan lazzaroni, and livs mostly on what old, hollow-eyed devotees are begging for him. This lazy and ignorant individual of the Holy Ghost firm declared once last spring that none but the uneducated were unbelievers in the Bible. Yet I am perfectly satisfied that every TRUTH SEEKER reader could astonish that braying ass of the gospel with the proof that they know more about that old fogy book than he ever did or will know. Every Infidel could prove to him and all the rest who are banging the Bible so eagerly, and that without going outside of the Bible, too, that the Pentateuch was written later than the book of Joshua; that Joshua was not written before the tim of Kings; that none of the Old Testament prophecies refers to Christ; that the boy Isaiah speaks of was the exported baby of his king's wife (a very common thing for a priest to know); that the tale of Daniel and the lion's den was not known yet when Ezra and his helpmates compiled the old book, and that it was not written until 175 years before Christ, and so thousands of other things from and about the Bible he has not the faintest idea of. Such are the men who, no matter how often they peep in the Bible, don't even know yet that Genesis givs two different creation stories; that God divided the day from the night after he had mornings and evenings already for several days; made man before and after he got tired from his work; raised vegetables without the light and warmth of the sun, and many other absurdities, declaring us ignoramuses.

I meet but one or two of the average Christians who hav the slightest idea of any contradictions in their beloved New Testament. An imbecil look of their eyes meets me every time I refer to them. Revelations are to them to hear that the child Jesus lived in Egypt as a fugitiv and peacefully in the town of Nazareth at the same time; that Jesus was crucified at the third hour, although he was exposed by Pilate at the sixth; that he was standing in full view of the people at the same hour that he was hanging on the cross; that the woman went to Jesus's sepulcher while it was dark, although the sun was rising; that they wondered to find the stone rolled away, although they saw an angel come down from heaven and roll it away; that Christ ascended into heaven on the day of the resurrection, although he remained on earth forty days longer; and so of many other impossibilities. Such are the class of mankind who recommend us to read the Bible after we hav made a thorough study of it.

Not feeling able to deny s all and every knowledge, they allow us at least a Liberal education, not knowing how, by allowing that much, inferior they place themselvs to us. Our Christian friends, after having together with us passed through school, consider their stored-away public-school or college lumber sufficient for life, while we, instead of relaxing then, keep up our studies through life. Would they become book-worms like the Infidels they would undoubtedly learn that no original history of what is termed Christ's age exists that refers to the Judean tramp, although every other occurrence of that age is minutely bequeathed to mankind. In their giddiness they twaddle of some of their history that knows all about it. Well, is it not strange that they do, and cannot produce it? Jeshu, or Jesus, who was stoned to death and nailed to a tree for sorcery by the Jews about 100 B. C., and who had followers answering to the names of some given in the New Testament, gave the foundation, and Christna and Buddha the model, for the legend of the carpenter-savior.

It would be recommendable to our Christian friends to resume the study of history, and learn that Tacitus, in the year 104 A.D., was the first who mentioned Christianity; that Justin, 150 A.D., was the first who mentioned Christ himself; that Irenæus, 175 A.D., was the first who knew of any gospel; that after a twenty-five years wrangle at the council of Nice, the gospels that the New Testament contains to-day were voted for by debauched bishops, who, with pockets crammed full of gospels, even killed one the other in their rage; and that Emperor Constantine, the wife and child murderer, by the power of the sword established the divinity of Christ. Through study of history they would also learn that their religion "of love" put to death millions of heretics, and killed at least fifty millions of people in the name of their monster God.

Paulinians, Albigenses, and others were massacred by the hundreds of thousands. Torquemada alone burnt at the stake, alive, over 10,000 heretics. Alva killed nearly 100,000 in the Netherlands; 60,000 Huguenots were slain in France in three days. The great and pious Christian, Charlemagne, butchered 8,000 Saxons in a few hours. Half a million witches were stripped naked, fastened to the stake, and roasted alive. The Puritans of New England and the Presbyterians of Scotland enjoyed such diabolical roasting processes just as eagerly as the Roman Catholics. Poor Quaker children were traded by the Puritans for molasses to the Bermudas. The Christian church of to-day, if not prevented by the steady growing power of Infidelity, would be the same persecuting church; yes, they show it plainly, where ever they gain power enough to do so. If mothers must inoculate their children with fabulous tales of the past, they would do better by substituting "Jack the Giant-Killer" for the son of Mary. The former only killed dangerous giants, while the other damns mankind for not believing in his fraudulent missions to everlasting punishment. But, no! their pastor takes good care to hav them perpetuate ignorance and superstition, and to eradicate from the minds of youth every natural and rational idea, and to substitute in lieu the most nonsensical and stupefying metaphysical jargon.

One world at a time, if there is nother after this. Even if I did believe in a future I could not accept the carpenter of Nazareth, feeling assured that God, on my arrival at his heavenly gate, would sing out: "Ha! An Infidel! just walk in, stay near me and make yourself at home. You knew how to take care of yourself without my agency in the other world, and so you will undoubtedly here, while those Christians, who were nothing but trouble to me while on earth by constant praying and begging, are almost torturing me up here, clamoring for their treasures, stored away in heaven, of which I know nothing."

A few words yet to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of this coast.

We hav not many journals in California that are independent enough and that are edited by men who hav moral courage enough to giv us Liberals, and especially us Materialists, a hearing. Those few we do hav, therefore, should be supported by the united force. Among the leading papers of the state, the Sacramento Record-Union, before all others, ought to be made the home journal of every Liberal's household. To those who liv in the upper Sacramento valley and surrounding mountains, I must urgently recommend the Butte county Record. It is ably-conducted journal, and treats everybody alike. The Infidel is just as welcome to its columns as the Christian. Those who read these lines will do well by assisting such an editor in his efforts, whereas such smeary and cheesy sheets as the San Francisco Bulletin, Call, and Chico-Enterprise ought not receive a farthing from a truth seeker. E. W. FITZNER.

NORWICH, CONN., Oct 1, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: It has been a long time since writing you, and I thought you might like to know what that impious Boardman is driving at among the clerical conspirators and medical monopolists of this vicinity.

Our old antagonists—the D. D's. or demon doctors—hav been on their good behavior for some time, and do not interfere with the good works of Infidels so much as they did in the notorious "counter-petition" campaign when they sought to slam the prison doors in the face of a dreaded opponent, hoping to thereby stop the mouth of a troublesome truth seeker. But the pretentious pill-doctors are on the war-path, and are intriguing against us in the matter of medical rights, and I hav been doing all I could to oppose their schemes. In this effort, as in the clerical contest, so far as local action was concerned, I was obliged to meet the brunt of the battle alone. I hardly know which is the source of greatest danger to the welfare of humnity, doctors of drugs or doctors of demonry—the former stupefies the body by deadly doses, the latter stultifies the soul by cankering creeds, while both seek political power in order to force their vile nostrums on the people. From the pious frauds of theological quackery and the learned ignorance of medical orthodoxy, in the language of a clerical cant phrase, "Good Lord, deliver us!"

Cooley's Weekly is getting brave and Liberal, and is doing a good work among people not easily reached by Radical papers. It has admitted my articles on Spiritualism and medical rights free of charge. In face of the fact that it cost $25.00 per column for a hearing, while repelling the clerical attacks on Bro. Bennett and his friends, the outlook is encouraging.

I inclose circular on medical rights and an article relating to the Niantic camp-meeting, which hav appeared in its columns. Let the good work still go on. BYRON BOARDMAN.

STREATOR, ILL., Oct. 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $10 for two shares for the trip around the world, one for P. F. Gray and one for Solomon Werthen. Mr. Werthen would like you to spell his name right, and not put "hel" on the end of it, for he is one of Ingersoll's pupils, and don't believe in it or hades. I am very anxious every week to see Saturday come to get my paper and read the letters from Mr. Bennett's trip around the world. I remain, P. F. GRAY.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $6—$5 for "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully, JAMES W. DARE.

BOZEMAN, MON. TER., Sept. 23, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: That you may see there are men in this portion of the globe who are not "moss-backs," but alive to the issues of the age, I send you a copy of the Bozeman Avant-Courier, containing a review of the Ingersoll-Black Discussion. The article in question is entitled "Christianity on Trial."

I want to inquire, Hav Liberal public speakers no glory in their souls? Tourists visit our wonderland from almost all parts of the civilized world, but none of the aforesaid fall in line. Why not come and see our geysers, do a little duty on the skirmish line, and let us know what they hav to say? They would not alone be amply repaid in sight-seeing, but would meet a host of admiring friends. Of course this suggestion, like Jesus hrist and his figs, is out of season, as the proper time to visit wonderland would the early part of n xt autumn. THOS. BURK.

PRESCOTT, ARIZONA TER., Sept. 24, 1881.

FRIEND EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5—$3 for the paper till July, 1881, and I will leave the $2 that remain with you till your round-the-world history comes out, and then I will send enough to finish paying for it. I will be sure to want it. C. C. GLENN.

GREENWOOD, N. Y., Oct. 4, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see that my time is up for the paper. Please find inclosed $3 for another year. I would like to send $5 for the books containing Mr. Bennett's letters describing his trip around the world, but cannot spare it now. Perhaps I will hav it in the turn of the year, and, if do, you will get it.

Truly yours, R. L. ALVORD.

DEADWOOD, DAK. TER., Sept. 30, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find $3, which place to my credit on subscription. We are all pleased with Mr. Bennett's letters. Even the children are getting interested in the paper through those letters. His powers of description are indeed marvelous, and he seems to let no object of interest escape him. I believe the books, illustrated as they will be, and brimful of truth told in a most captivating manner, will be the greatest acquisition to Liberal literature of the century, particularly as they will instruct the young as well as the old. I think the scheme of sending Mr. Bennett abroad was a grand one on the whole, but am afraid that unless many more subscribe to the fund it will be ruinous to his financial interests. Wishing him and the paper every success, and you also, I remain sincerely a truth seeker and a truth lover, D. P. WILLCOX.

OTTAWA, ., Oct. 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please fi) within ten dollars and a half. Enroll Mr. George Harding of this place as a subscriber to the publication, "Trip Around the World by D. M. Bennett." Five dollars is to be placed to my account for the above publication. The half-dollar is for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is to be mailed to the address of George Harding for three months.

If all the friends of Liberalism will forward fifty cents to THE TRUTH SEEKER in favor of some fr end who is "on the fence," he will be a benefactor to his race, and do more to break the chains of superstition than all the street "wind-mills" on exhibition during the last half-century. C. E. BEARDSLEY.

KNIGHTSTOWN, IND., Oct. 1., 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Having just finished reading the article written by Mr. Bennett, I take up the pen to-night to inform you that I never read a more intelligent piece of writing in my life, and I read a great deal. I feel it my duty to distribute two or three of those papers containing that article to some friends who are just beginning to think, so I inclose stamps for three copies of the issue of Sept. 24th. I failed to get the papers on the two weeks preceding the 24th, and I wrote you a postal this morning asking you to send them, as I could not think of losing the events of Mr. Bennett's journey. Your paper lifts my mind out of all superstition (though I never entertained much) and makes me feel like a new being. For I am surrounded by Christians, as I am a school-teacher. But for the last five years, since I began to think, I am pleased to see the progress the Christians hav made in this place. They are now seeing the position they occupy in this land of freedom. They now begin to see that it is the school, not the church, that is giving this nation its superiority over many others. A Christian minister made that remark, and though you may not liv to see it and I may not liv to see it, yet the day is coming and it is coming fast, when this shall no longer be a land of mental bondage, when every man, woman, and child shall be allowed to speak and write their honest thoughts. E. M.

PICKENS CO., S. C., Oct. 6, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Though an entire stranger to you I a not such to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that fact alone I hope will be a sufficient apology for this intrusion. Through the kindness of your old Infidel friend R. M. Casey, I hav had access to your paper for the last two years, and it is with me now an indispensable household treasure. I am only a young convert from the murky labyrinth of Methodism to the salubrious atmosphere of reason. What a happy man I am to-day, compared with what I was three years ago! I wish I had the mind and pen to giv you and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER a full account of my escape om the wilderness and at the same time express my gratitude to the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and old brother Casey for aiding me in liberating myself from the shackles of priestcraft and blind superstition. But suffice it to say, I am out of the old orthodox pasture, and out to stay.

Inclosed you will find fifty cents in stamps. Please place that amount to the credit of R. M. Casey. In him you and I hav a true friend and the L beral cause a fearless advocate. I intend ere long to become a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but cannot do so just now. With fraternal regard, I am

Yours truly, E. B. STEPHENS.

JAMESTOWN, Sept. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: We are now reading Bro. Bennett's letters from abroad with a great deal of pleasure. We also enjoy your letters from friends, and are glad to see the number increasing, and hope they may continue to do so. We heartily sympathize with you in your efforts for the good of humanity, and wish we were able to aid you in a more material way, but we are getting old. I was seventy last May, and my husband will be in the month of February, and he has been helpless for several years, and we are dependent upon others for our support.

Yours fraternally, MR. and MRS. A. SMITH.

SPRINGVILLE, MICH., OCT. 3, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by the tab on my paper that I am indebted to you. Inclosed please find $3 to renew my subscription. I think that I hav got one man to subscribe for the paper if he has not already. I am trying all that I can to keep the wheel moving. I admire your letters very much. Believe me your brother and co-worker, GEORGE LOCKERBY.

DUNDEE GATES, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find draft for $3.00, to be placed to the credit of Arnold Corey on subscription for THE TRUT SEEKER. His address as above. My good wife pasted one of those posters you sent me on a piece of thick paper (a part of a discarded box got at one of our stores), and I hung it up in the most conspicuous place I could find in our post-office, I trust permanently.

Respectfully yours, J. J. HOLLETT.

OAKLAND, CAL., Sept. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed post-office order for $3, to pay the present year's subscription of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am requested by a number of prominent Liberal Freethinkers of this city who are anxious to organize for the purpose of forming a Liberal League on the same principle as those of the Eastern states, with the exception of the taxation of church property. Church property here is taxed the same as all other property throughout the state. A copy of the by-laws and Constitution of the Liberal League is much desired; if you keep copies and will be kind enough to forward the same, with cost, the money will be remitted in due time, with many thanks to you for the same. Yours respectfully,

WM. STOKES.

Criticism of All Religious Revelations.—II.

BY PROF. H. M. KOTTINGER.

THEIR CONTENTS.

In order to understand the fallacy of all religious revelations, let us consider them from the standpoint of their contents. From the fruit we learn to recognize the tree, and from the work its master. Most of the revelations contain a theory on the origin of the universe. Such a one communicates to us Carl Frederic Koepper of the religion of Buddha. I quote his words: "Brahma, or the world-soul, does not create the world, but develops himself in it; but by developing himself he recedes from himself; and the farther he recedes the more he becomes unlike to himself, the worse grows the Brahma-substance. In this manner takes issue a series, a scale of more or less perfect realms of creatures. Consequently nature consists only in the departure and estrangement from God; therefore she is perishable, full of sin, the earth an abode of misery."

To this theory must be objected that the world-soul has a spiritual nature, therefore has no extension in space. Experience, too, contradicts the opinion that the earth is an abode of misery. But this whole theory of Buddhism is too insipid to be investigated deeper by criticism. Let us pass, then, to the cosmogony of the newer revelations.

What they report of the creation "of two large and many small lights of the firmament" and of the rest of natural objects, we all know, and for this reason we can pass it over in silence; only the fundamental idea of this theory, that Jehovah or Brahma or Allah has made the universe, will I consider a moment. Feuerbach says in his celebrated work, "The Essence of Christianity:" "While thou sayest that the world is made from nothing, thou removest all limits of thy mind from the brain; for it is the barrier of thy mind, is alone the partition-wall between thee and thy God. Thou art offended by the primitiv, independent existence of the universe, because thou considerest it only from a subjectiv, selfish standpoint, only in its vulgarity, as a machine, not in its majesty, as cosmos."

A principal part of the contents of the revelation, further, is formed by the doctrins of providence, of prayer, and faith. The Koran goes in the first point in the notion of providence, so far off that it assures its confessors that they could fight fearlessly in the densest shower of bullets without being hit if Allah has not destined them to death beforehand.

The providence of the biblical revelation, too, is another than the natural one. This lets man sink in the water and drown if he cannot swim; but the biblical one piles up the waves of the sea like walls, and lets her darlings pass dry-shod. If a man believes that he has no other providence than the forces of his species, the Christians call him Atheist, because he only believes in a natural providence. But if the providence which manifests itself in the fangs of animals is a truth, the providence of the biblical revelation must be an untruth.

Another important dogma of the revelations is prayer. A man who has satisfied himself that in this life everything is meditated, that every effect must hav a cause, and that every desire can only be satisfied when we employ the necessary means—such a man does not pray, he only works. In prayer man addresses himself to the benevolence of an omnipotent being; he adores his own mind, his desires. The essential act of religion is prayer; it is omnipotent. If the gods of the revelations hav no reality, why do people implore their help? Says Dr. D. Strauss, "Why speakest thou to somebody who is not here?"

But the most prominent feature in the doctrins of the three youngest revelations is faith, blind faith. Their followers are obliged to believe in the truth of the most incomprehensible, most absurd doctrins, for they are p tended to be the emanation from the eternal, infallible truth. According to them there is no more serious sin than Infidelity. In the Koran it is expressly commanded to exterminate the Infidels with fire and sword. In the Old Testament, the Ammonites, Moabites, and other people confining the Hebrews is another example. The Mohammedans and Jews hav also, according to the testimony of history, annihilated millions of human beings.

The revelation of the New Testament caused even more atrocities. True, it commands also charity, but it subjects charity to faith, its charity is hypocritical—is only kind to one as far as he does not touch the faith—it imagins the most diabolic sophistries, as Augustine does in his apology for the persecution of the heretics. It lights funeral pyres of martyrs, and burns their bodies in order to save their souls from damnation. The Christian may only love the Christian; also the personal enemy, inasmuch as he is a Christian, but not the public enemy, namely, the Infidel. The Infidel is considered an outlaw by the faithful. To John Huss was assured personal security by the Council of Constance; nevertheless he was burnt at the stake, for the council declared that it was not obliged to keep word with a heretic. The Inquisition tribunal killed by sword and fire millions of heretics. Who can believe in the divine origin of a revelation which caused such infernal misdeeds?

True, times grew milder, but to whom are we indebted for this amelioration? Not to the belief in revelations. On the contrary, to the doubters of them, to the Freethinkers and heretics. Even in our age the Infidel is persecuted, and avoided like a leper. Proofs of this assertion are frequently afforded by the newest history of religion, since Thomas Paine is anathematized by the Christians to the present day, and Freethinkers owe it only to the public laws of our country that the Christians dare not renew the autos-da-fe of the middle ages.

But suffice it to hav examined a few doctrins of the revelations. For a thorough investigation many books would be needed, but even from these few remarks it follows that these revelations cannot stand the trial of criticism.

A Dream.

FROM H. HEINE, BY G. GOSSMAN, A. M

I dream: I am a heathen god,
And sitting in the skies,
With little angels sitting round
To praise my melodies.

Am eating candies and the like
For many an honest bit,
And drinking wine the very best
And living out of debt.

I feel myself quite lonesome then,
And wish I were below;
And much as I would be on earth
I hav no time to go.

Thou haughty angel Gabriel,
Now haste and get thee gone;
Go bring my honest friend, Eugene,
Before my heavenly throne.

He spreads his wings, a noble pair,
And speeds to earth below,
And nabs the chap and brings him up
As I had ordered to.

Says I, My friend, I am the Lord,
The ruler of the skies;
I told you I'd do great things yet,
And to your great surprise.

I'm doing wonders every day,
And you'll be pleased to see
How I'll do one before you now,
And fill your town with glee.

And of that pavement in the street
I'll cause each stone to split,
And then an oyster fresh and clear
You'll find contained in it.

On it rain of lemon juice
I'll bountiful bestow,
And all the gutters in the street
Quite full of wine shall flow.

The holy priests and all the Pats
Are now in highest glee,
Who seldom strike a better day
On which to take a spree.

Indeed these folks are most surprised
At such a treat divine,
And, lying down, from gutters drink
The red and flowing wine.

They fondly hope, and wisely wish
Such rains might always stay,
And know that miracles like these
Can't happen every day.

Revival Religion.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Of all the wild delusions that
Ere crazed the human mind,
The wildest yet is Christ to get,
Or Holy Ghost to find.

They can be gulped like salts or pills,
Ghost-hunting dupes suppose.
A madman's brain could not conceive
Of a more senseless dose.

Or think that by the rantings of Fanatics and buffoons,
And prayers and groans of hypocrits,
Or howls of crazy loons,

A ghost to insane scenes would come,
Coerced by prayer's windy power,
Pour out himself in drops on some,
On some a mighty shower.

Those who believe they get deluged
With the pure liquid ghost
Are apt to jerk and jump and hop
And hoot and howl the most.

Like hens with heads cut off we see
The women flop around;
With hearts and heads beyond the skies
Their feet feel not the ground.

When ghost-surcharged, they ofttimes will,
Forgetful of their charms,
Instinctivly swoon right into
Some groaning male saint's arms.

Most like 'tis the revivalists'
Or their loved pastor's lot.
They close their eyes, they shriek and shout,
Religion they hav got.

We note this pentecostal shower
That but this ghost can pour
Snbsides like froth on ginger pop
As soon as meeting's o'er.

The season past, the victims cool,
Or suffer a relapse;
But when the pouring comes again
They'll be on hand, perhaps.

And then some swindling mountebank,
By contortions and grimaces,
Will frighten the poor lunatics
Into the ghost's embraces.

We thus observe there still are some
Priest-ridden men and ladies,
Who can be scared in these bright days
With threats of endless hades.

CHRONIC DISEASES,
Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."
Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY,

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.
BY JAMES PARTON.
With Portraits and other Illustrations.
This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.
Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English langnage. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

"DESIGN" IN NATURE.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the lunatic asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases; and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treatiug on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

Gems of Thought.

WHEN we consider that the germs of an infinit variety of diseases, that a tendency to gloominess, dullness, and even vice of all kinds, are just as transmissible to offspring as are good sound constitutions, a leaning toward good moral qualities, and a disposition to be vivacious, gay, and happy, we should be very careful how we choose the parents of our children, and also what conditions in life surround us and our companions when we are about entering upon the most important act of our lives—the perpetuating of ourselvs. We should so select the times as to be in the best possible frame of mind, as well as in sound bodily health and vigor. We should be happy, care-free, and full of hope, joy, and expectancy.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

IT is a great mistake to suppose, as many Christians believe, that Jesus was the first to proclaim what is known as the "Golden Rule." Scholars hav frequently pointed out that the sentiment was distinctly expressed in almost the very words ascribed to Jesus by Confucius in China (b. 551 B.C.), by Isocrates in Greece (b. 436 B.C.), and by Hillel in Judea (b. 112 B. C).—Underwood's Influence of Christianity.

To teach that God will giv us whatever we ask, if we do but importune him enough, is doctrin eminently false, yet it is so reiterated in the gospels that simple, innocent minds, which trustingly receive precepts, are apt to be deceived; more harm would be done were not most of us wiser herein than the teacher. That Jesus, with his noble disciple James, believed that prayer would bring a vast rain (cure the sick, and even—such is the hight of human folly and impudence—raise the dead), can scarcely be doubted, hence prayers in such matters hav been traditional in the Christian churches.—F. W. Newman.

OF course, those who really think that "whom the gods love die young," that early death is a desideratum ["a consummation devoutly to be wished"], that the less we hav of life the better, would consider it a misfortune to increase the average length of life. But for those of us who consider it a doubtful compliment to God to think of this world as good for nothing but to get out of it, every discovery or artifice that can prolong the life of man and keep it sweet and same will be thrice welcome. Let us liv our longest and our best, and we know that we cannot exhaust its capabilities of knowledge, use, and joy. We do not doubt that there are things beyond as good as any here, but that there are the same things, or even similar, we hav no assurance. Wherefore, while we are here, we want to made sure of as much of the beauty and the glory that are here as possible and build it into the inmost structure of our souls.—J. W. Chadwick.

MORALITY itself, what we call the moral quality of a man—what is this but another side of the one vital force whereby he is and works? All that a man does is physiognomical of him. You may see how a man would fight in the way in which he sings; his courage, or want of courage, is visible in the word he utters—in the opinion he has formed, no less than in the stroke he strikes. He is one, and preaches the same self abroad in all these ways.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

"A WONDERFUL man was this Cæsar!
You are a writer and I am a fighter, but here is a fellow
Who could both write and fight, and in both was equally skilful," Straightway answered and spoke John Alden, the comely, the youthful.
"Yes, he was equally skilled, as you say; with his pen and his weapons,
Somewhere hav I read—but where, I forget—he could dictate Seven letters at once, at the same time writing his Memoirs." —Longfellow's Miles Standish.

"SEE how these Christians love one another!" was the just and striking exclamation of the heathen in the first century. "There are no wild beasts so ferocious as Christians who differ concerning their faith," was the equally striking and probably equally just exclamation of the heathen of the fourth century.—Lecky's History of Rationalism.

THE aspect of the universe is not "full of benevolence and intelligence," as Dr. Dewey alleges; but it has wide room for and actually displays a vast extent of the opposit qualities. Plague, pestilence, famin, battle, murder, pain, cruelty, triumphant injustice, affliction of the innocent, ignorance, folly, wrong of all sorts, abound in that little spot of the universe with which we are acquainted. If a principle of goodness be necessary to account for goodness in the universe, then a principle of badness must be necessary to account for badness in the universe. If the unknown principle "must be conceived of as embracing in it an infinit wisdom and goodness," when we look on the fair side of the universe, must it not in equal strictness of logic "be conceived of as embracing in it an infinit" unwisdom and badness when we look on the foul side?—N. R. Waters.

No man whatever believes, or can believe, exactly what his grandfather believed. He enlarges somewhat by fresh discovery his view of the universe, and consequently his theorem of the universe, which is an infinit universe, and can never be embraced wholly or finally by any view or theorem in any conceivable enlargement; he enlarges somewhat, I say; finds somewhat that was credible to his grandfather inevitable to him, false to him, inconsistent with some new thing he has discovered or observed. It is the history of every man, and in the history of mankind we see it summed up into great historical amounts—revolutions, new epochs. Dante's "mountain of purgatory" does not stand "in the ocean of the other hemisphere" when Columbus has once sailed thither. Men find no such thing extant in the other hemisphere. It is not there. It must cease to be believed to be there. So will all belief whatever in this world—all systems of belief and systems of practice that spring from these.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

Odds and Ends.

MRS. JUMP, of Iowa, has just borne three children. This is the best three jumps on record.

SINCE the arrival of Senator Ingalls's tenth baby Kansas proudly calls him "the giant colonizer."

IF cremation is generally adopted, man will always be in possession of the urnings of his friends.

A NEW song is entitled "Between the Green Corn and the Gold." It should be sung in a husky voice.

"HOW many carriages shall you want to haul the grief?" is the way the undertakers put it in Deadwood.

THERE is a girl in Gloucester so modest that she will not allow the Christian Observer to remain in her room over night.

"BACCHUS has drowned more men than Neptune." It is safer to go clear over the seas than it is to get half seas over.

GEORGE WASHINGTON was a great general. It was not until he adorned a postage stamp that he was licked behind his back.

"WHAT comes after T?" asked a teacher of a pupil who was learning the alphabet. He received the bewildering reply, "You do—to see 'Liza."

A MAN in Philladephia varnished fifty big watermelons to see how long they would keep. They kept until the workmen in a carriage shop next door discovered them.

METEOROLOGICAL: "When the day begins to lengthen the cold begins to strengthen," and conversely, "When the days begin to shorten then the heat begins to hotten."

UNDER the new law of New York state, a man who marries must support his wife. Hitherto the girl's father has been expected to take care of her for about six months of the year.

JUST before the table time ladies of station adjust their switches, annex their trains, and roll into the drawing-room, where they couple with the gentlemen, who make tracks for refreshment

A HIELAN' thief stole a bale of cloth from an old woman's shop in most barefaced manner. "Ye'll pay for that, ye thief," yelled the old woman. "When?" "At the last day." "Weel, sin' ther's sic lang credit, I'll e'en just tak anither."

THERE is an awful state of affairs in a little Michigan town where a compositor substituted the word "widows" for "windows." The editor wrote: "The windows of the church need washing badly. They are too dirty for any use, and are a disgrace to our village."

A MINISTER called upon to open the Arkansas senate with prayer repeated the Lord's Prayer, whereupon one gentleman turned to another and said: "He stole that, and I will bet on it. I heard the same idea expressed two years ago at a funeral in Eureka."

"YOU make me think," John Williams said dropping on a sofa beside a pretty girl the other evening, "of a bank whereon the wild thyme grows." "Do I?" she murmured; "it is so nice but that is pa's step in the hall, and unless you can drop out of the front window before I cease speaking, you'll hav a wild time with him, my own, for he loves you not." His descent was rapid.

WHEN the Chicago Times comes to publish the revised Old Testament in full, a Boston paper, the Transcript, predicts that it will introduce the volume with head-lines like these: "Creation Unmasked! A Family Tragedy! Escape of the Murderer! A Fruitful Feud—An Apple Evicts Them! Fearful Fresbet! Showers of Brimstone! Full Particulars! Interesting Developments!"

A FEW days ago two miners were standing in front of the general post-office at Newcastle viewing the new buildings at Amen Corner. "Noo, Geordie," said one, "that's a clivvor buildin' altegithor. Aa believe that used to be pairt o' the chorchyard where ma gran'feythor wes barried." "Wey, ye beggor, Bill," responded the other, "hoo's them folks that's lying thor te get up at the risorection wi' that greet buildin' o' the top o' them?"

A GREENGROCER and amateur preacher who livs within fifty miles of Gateshead was once "holding forth" at a place near his nativ town. After the preliminary services, he addressed the congregation as follows: "Ma Christian friends, aall tyek ma tex' frev Look's gospel, nineteenth cheptor an' twenty-forst verse, where ye'll find these words, 'Thoo airt an oyster [austere] man.' Ma frinds, the Lord is ripresinted as an oyster man; sinners is the oysters, an' hivin's the poke to put them in."

A WANDERING tribe called the Siouxs,
Wear moccasins, having no shiouxs;
They are made of buckskin,
With the fleshy side in,
Embroidered with beads of bright hyiouxs.

When out on the war-path, the Siouxs
March single file—never by tiouxs—
And by "blazing" the trees
Can return at their ease,
And their way through the forests ne'er liouxs.

All new-fashioned boats he eschiouxs
And uses the birch-bark caniouxs;
These are handy and light,
And, inverted at night,
Giv shelter from storms and from dyiouxs.

The principal food of the Siouxs
Is Indian maize, which they briouxs,
And hominy make,
Or mix in a cake,
And eat it with pork—as they chiouxs.

. . . . . .

Now, doesn't this spelling look cyiouxrious?
'Tis enough to make any one fyiouxrious!
So a word to the wise,
Pray our language revise
With orthography not so injiouxrious.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. Dr. Thomas of Chicago says of his expulsion from the Methodist denomination for heresy: "The Hebrew language has the phrase 'Batots,' which translated means, 'in the out.' That's where I am." He will organize an independent congregation.

THE London Lancet is greatly opposed to church bells, regarding their "ding-dong and jangle" as a very serious annoyance to the sick. It says that in many cases the loss of rest and the general disquiet they produce lessen the chance of recovery, and expedite a fatal issue. The same opiuion is gaining ground in many of our large cities

THE New York Express suggested that the President's minister should take his text from Daniel xi, 24. "He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places, . . . and he shall do that which his fathers hav not done, nor his father's fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey, and spoil, and riches." And all the congregation will shout "Amen!"

IN a business meeting of the First Presbyterian church of Toronto the Committee on Finance reported a falling off in income of $300 a year, and it was moved and seconded that the decrease was "mainly due to the injurious conduct of the minister." The presiding officer was that same minister, and he refused to put the resolution to a vote, denominating it, with a strange misuse of slang, "nothing but taffy."

CORA L. V. RICHMOND, a Spiritualist medium, induced eight hundred Chicagoans to pay twenty-five cents each to hear what she said was an address by the spirit of Garfield. She represented the dead President as saying that Lincoln was the first person he beheld in the spirit land, and that together they accompanied the funeral train from Long Branch to Cleveland. He afterward enjoyed the society of Washington, Jefferson, and Adams.

THE original manuscript of the "Book of Mormon" is in the possession of David Whitmer, of Richmond, Mo. Mr. Whitmer, now 78, was a follower of Joseph Smith, but left the Mormons when they took to polygamy. He still professes faith in Smith's claim to divine inspiration, and will on no account part with the book, which he declares was copied by Smith from the tablets of stone. His son shares his views, and says it is not likely, therefore, that the volume will soon fall into the hands of "either degenerate Mormons or irreverent curiosity hunters."

THE Baptist Weekly prints this slush regarding the assassination of President Garfield: "As Jesus answered Pilate, 'Thou couldst hav no power at all against me except it were given thee from above,' so we may believe still that no evil can occur without his permission. We cannot more surely dishonor God or strike away every support for our own comfort than to harbor the thought that for one moment he has abdicated his throne, or allowed the senseless fiendishness which may enter a human heart to usurp control of the lives of individuals or the affairs of nations. The history of this nation proves so surely the divine regard that to be fearful and discouraged even in the face of this great calamity is to prove ourselvs a wicked and faithless generation."

TIME after time, as a new President takes the oath and goes through the mummery of kissing the Bible, some sucker puts in his nose while the slobber is yet on the leaf, and reports to the world what particular verse the President's lips touched. This favor has just been performed for President Arthur. The inference sought to be conveyed is that the book was opened at random, and the verses reported always hav some significant meaning in connection with the man and the office. But the truth is the book is always opened designedly at that spot, or the whole thing is a romance—quite likely the latter. We insist that if the book was opened at random at any place in the Old Testament, there would be three chances to one that the official lips would press some such literature as is found in the twenty-third chapter of Deuteronomy, or something much worse, and that it would be more preferable, if something must be kissed. to substitute a deck of cards or Davy Crockett's comic almanac.—Kansas Chief.

THE Rev. Robert Matlock, who was a wild exhorter of note in Arkansas, found that Methodism imposed too much restraint upon him, and therefore invented a new sect, in which a belief in blood atonement was the peculiarity. He soon obtained a numerous following, and at the camp-meetings which he held lambs were burned on altars. He was a queer speaker, and had a habit of calling sinners by name from the pulpit, with such descriptiv epithets as "liar," "knave," and "thief." Tom Miller was thus assaulted, and he told the preacher that the abuse must be stopped. The two men met at a fair, discussed the subject a while, and agreed to shake hands; but when Matlock extended his hand there was a knife in it, and he stabbed Miller to the heart as a "blood atonement." A jury declared the murderer irresponsibly insane, and he was released. That was a year ago, and the next seen of him by the public was this week, when his body was found hanging to a tree. Friends of Tom Miller had caught and lynched him. But the new religion, called New Light, still survives.

PINK COTTAGE has been sold by a sheriff to satisfy a mortgage of only $60. It was opened a year or two ago by the Rev. George O. Barnes, in the mountain region of Kentucky, as a hospital for the miraculous cure of patients through prayer. Barnes was a famous revivalist in that region, and wonderful stories of his miracles were circulated; but the virtue seemed to depart from him when he established Pink Cottage, for the sick persons on whom he laid his hands were not cured. The receipts failed to cover the expenses, and hence the sale. "Dear friends," Barnes says in a sarcastic letter for publication, "what will you say when the Master comes—you who hav been blessed beyond the power of tongue to utter it, by the Lord, through me? Since I hav been to these wild mountains for you, and what hav you given to this work? Not a dollar. I might hav starved for all you seem to hav cared. Do you think I hav not gone with this to the dear Lord many a time, saying, 'Lord, let me not hate and despise these friends of mine?' It is easy to forgiv an enemy to one who knows well the love of God. My struggle has been not to despise my friends. And now I hav conquered this last indignity. $60! Had it not been conquered I would not write these words. So I make what excuses love unrequited can make and leave it all with Jesus." We hope his example of "leaving it all with Jesus," will not be generally followed, for so far as we know Jesus is not in the habit of paying anybody's bills.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Springfield Republican makes a long examination of the American Bible Society's latest report, and says: "If an attempt was made therein to furnish an exact and clear answer to the question, 'What is the amount of the resources of the American Bible Society?' the effort was a flat failure. If, on the other hand, an attempt was made to furnish a statement which, while nominally an answer to the question, really kept back part of the resources, the effort was as successful, perhaps, as the conditions of the case would permit. To sum up the results of this examination, there is an understatement of assets of at least $409,614. There is an overstatement of the amount expended for 'strictly benevolent and missionary work' of $117,700. Or take this view of the matter: What has been the net result in gratuitous Bible distribution in the United States of the possession of a capital of $1,585,393 and receipts of donations, collections, and legacies of $279,446 for the last year? And what has been the cost of administration and distribution? The capital invested would earn at 4 per cent say $63,000; add donations, etc., $279,446, will make the total $342,446, the amount which, the capital being invested at interest, should hav been available for Bible work. Deduct the sum expended in foreign fields, viz., $84,894, the amount applied to increase of capital, $56,308, and the largest sum that can hav been expended in Bible distribution in the United States (see above) is $60,423. This makes a total of $201,625. The remainder, $140,821, is a fair estimate of the real cost of administration and distribution, and is equivalent to 232 per cent on the cost of Bibles distributed gratuitously in the United States."

THE town of Norwich, Ct., is laughing over the predicament of the Rev. Leonard Woolsey Bacon, who last Sunday afternoon violated one of the old Connecticut "Blue Laws," which he was so vehement two years ago in upholding. In the summer of 1879 the managers of the excursion steamer Ella, plying between Norwich and Watch Hill, advertised a Sunday excursion. The Rev. Mr. Bacon secured Revivalist Hurd's mammoth gospel tent and delivered to half the citizens of the town the most terrific verbal broadsides, denouncing the proposed violation of the law. He planted himself on the provisions of an old Blue law that expressly forbids all Sunday travel, both for business and recreation. The effect of the speech was irresistible. The Sunday excursions were abandoned after one trip. Since then there has been no attempt to project a Sunday pleasure party. On Sunday evening last Mr. R. B. Hayes came to Norwich and remained over Sunday, the guest of Mr. Bacon. Mr. Hayes has been a strong friend of Dr. L. W. Bacon, of New Haven, since his inauguration. At that time it was said that he wrote to the New Haven divine, asking his advice as to the tenability of his (Hayes's) claim to the Presidential office. Dr. Bacon advised Hayes to maintain his claim, and, acting on that advice, Mr. Hayes took his seat. Mr. Hayes is a warm friend of Dr. L. W. Bacon, eldest son of the New Haven clergyman. He came to Norwich almost unnoticed. He attended services in Park church, of which the Rev. Mr. Bacon is pastor, in the morning and evening. In the afternoon Mr. Bacon hitched up a fine team and took his guest and the Hon. John T. Wait, Congressman from his district, to ride. They visited the places of interest about Norwich. Monday morning at an early hour Mr. Hayes slipped out of town, returning, so it is said, to New Haven. The local newspapers, in an account of Sunday's drive, published a copy of the Blue Law statute which Dr. Bacon, Mr. Hayes, and the Hon. John T. Wait violated. The statute reads as follows, and is the one that Mr. Bacon appealed to in his philippic against steamboat excursions on Sunday: "Section 6. Every proprietor or driver of any vehicle, not employed in carrying the United States mail, who shall allow any person to travel therein on Sunday, between sunrise and sunset, except from necessity or mercy, shall be fined $20, to be paid to the town in which the offense is committed." It is clearly the duty of the authorities to arrest Dr. L. W. Bacon, Col. John T. Wait, and Rutherford B. Hayes, and, on conviction, to fine them $20 each. Mr. Hayes has escaped. Dr. Bacon and Mr. Wait are still here. They hav not been arrested; neither has Dr. Bacon volunteered any apology for his inconsistency. The writer met Mr. Wait this morning, and asked him whether he was aware that he had violated the law. "Yes," was the reply. "But," scratching his head and jingling the keys in his right-hand trouser's pocket, "you know I went in for letting the Ella go." A curious crowd gathered in Park church last Sunday to see Mr. Hayes. It was announced Monday evening that Manager Walker, of the steamer Ella, will cause the arrest of Dr. Bacon in retaliation.

News of the Week.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Riches, authority, and influence over the affairs of the province prepared for me the most agreeable lot that one may desire for himself. Friendship and love blessed me. There was, at that period, almost too much sunshine and too little shade, and all grew into light, rose-colored monotony.

The death of Clementine's grandfather gave occasion for family mourning, and, for conventionalities' sake, our wedding was postponed for half a year. That could not grieve us. We were daily in each others' company, and nothing in the world could separate us.

Marshal de Montreval treated me in the first months with extraordinary grace. But I never was able to treat him with familiarity, or to return his kind inclination toward me with any degree of heartiness. His friendly treatment had something threatening. He was a man of intelligence and discernment, and yet subject to prejudices, which he in all probability owed to the convent education of his childhood years, and which he valued like sacred relics. Enervated through former dissipations, he was sickly, fearful of death, tormented by imaginations, and distrusting. It did not trouble his conscience in the least to commit very arbitrary acts, to become severe to crūelty, to sacrifice the welfare of many a man to one of his caprices, and to keep lewd women for himself. But at the same time he was very religious. The monks were his favorits, and guided him without his noticing it. He missed no mass, and was considered the most pious man. He smiled seldom, was mostly grave and cold; and in his demeanor lay something commanding.

Already in the first days of my residence in Nismes I was surrounded by a holy band of monks. These people feared from me an influence upon the marshal contrary to their desires. But they noticed soon how little I cared for influence over him, and gradually left me again. But they remained very friendly, praised to the marshal my character, and only regretted in the end that I was a man without any religion.

The Protestants of Nismes looked upon me as their head and protector. They bestowed upon me extravagant signs of honor, which must have excited the suspicion of the marshal, even if he had been less distrusting than he really was. They became bolder in their speeches and actions. More than once I succeeded in gaining for them the marshal's pardon for their inconsiderate actions. But instead of being warned by single occurrences of this kind, their religious enthusiasm increased in oftener repeated strifes with their persecutors, and with a secret reliance on my protection. I in vain described to them the danger which they wilfully prepared for themselvs.

"No," exclaimed Mr. Etienne, my uncle, "no; where God is there is no danger. O my Colas! do not be afraid of men, for the Lord is with thee. 'And he who acknowledges me before men, him I shall also acknowledge,' says the savior of the world. Also in France the mustard-seed of the gospel will grow, as upon the rocks of Switzerland and in the forests of Germany. But we must hav men like Zwingli, and Calvin, and Luther, who do not tremble before the princes of this world. And, Alamontada, be like them, and God is thy shield."

CHAPTER XXX.

"You are not a Huguenot?" the Marshal de Montreval asked me once, with penetrating look, when I once again had to plead for the Protestants. He denied my petition, and became from that time more reserved than ever.

I became aware how little good I could do anywhere under these circumstances, and how hurtful, on the other hand, my presence in Nismes, through my office and the imagination of my influence, must become to the Protestants, who leaned on me with altogether too great confidence. This induced me to the resolution to tender my resignation. And only Madame de Sonnes and Clementine, through their entreaties, prevented me from doing so during the winter. The marshal was in Montpellier, and his absence made me happier, it is true, but also the Protestants more bold.

It was on Palm Sunday, in the year 1703. The marshal, who had shortly before returned from Montpellier, had invited me to a feast in the castle. I did not feel well, yet I concluded to go.

"And to-morrow I ask my dismissal," said I in the morning, smiling to Clementine; "may mother say what she pleases, to-morrow it shall be. And then, Clementine ——"

"And then?" she asked.

"No longer our union at the altar delayed. We may well, with propriety, be merry, as thou to-day hast laid aside the mourning apparel. And a week from to-day thou wilt be my wife."

"And then," I continued, "then away from sad Nismes and to our new country seat near Montpellier. Spring comes with its beauty; we must enjoy it in free, open nature."

So it was concluded and sealed with a kiss.

At that I was called away from her. I went out. My uncle, Mr. Etienne, had come, and begged a private interview in my room.

"Colas," said he, "to-day is Palm Sunday. Thou must come with me."

"That is impossible," was my answer, "for I am invited by the marshal to dine with him."

"And I," said he, with solemn voice, "and I invite thee to the Lord's supper. No great one of this earth will there sit at table with us, but we are gathered there in Christ's name, and he will be in the midst of us. We all, several hundred, together with women and children, celebrate this morning the Lord's supper in my mill before the Carmelite gate."

I was terrified.

"What daring!" exclaimed I. "Do you not know that the marshal is in Nismes?"

"We know it, and Almighty God is there also."

"Do you want to plunge yourselvs purposely into misery and prison? The law prohibits most rigidly all gatherings of this kind. It threatens with death."

"What law? The law of the mortal king? Thou shalt obey God more than man."

So my uncle annihilated every one of my warnings with biblical commonplaces. The more I became aware of the danger of such gatherings, the more vividly I described to him the possible consequences thereof, the more zealous became my uncle.

"When Jesus was betrayed," he said, "and when the betrayer stood near him, and when he knew that they prepared to take him, O Colas, surrounded by the terrors of certain death, he instituted the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper. And we, we want to be Jesus's disciples. And tremble? No, never; and if all hell should appear in arms, it would cause us no terror."

My uncle's mind could not be changed. He called me a renegade, a hypocrit, a papist, and left me in wrath.

I returned to Clementine. She had seen my uncle and his vexation in all gestures. She inquired after the cause, but I did not dare to inform her. Under her innocent caresses I gradually lost my fear and excitement. She told me of the consent of her mother to all my wishes. This cheered me still more. On Clementine's bosom I indulged in fancies of a peaceful future. Withdrawn from the throng of humanity and its greedy passions, would I, in solitude, at the side of my young wife, surrounded by blossoming nature, dedicate my life to love, friendship, and the sciences.

How happy were we both in these moments! "O Clementine," said I, "in order to make others happy no throne is needed, but alone the will to do so! We can also be great in a small, unpretending sphere. We visit then together the huts of poverty. I defend then again abused innocence, and a kiss is my reward if I hav done something good. Our library furnishes us inexhaustible nourishment for the mind. Our harps resound in the evening in the shade of our own grove the unenvied bliss of two loving souls. At our table dine the needy, and the comforted ones will make up our society. Certainly, Clementine, we shall not long for the cold splendor of these palaces. And some day, O Clementine! Only the thought already thrills me with ecstasy! Some day, Clementine, thou wilt be mother!—mother! O Clementine!"—— Her kisses interrupted my words. Tenderly embraced by her, rocked on her bosom, we both trembled under imagination.

Then my servant entered, pale as a sheet, and almost breathless.

"What is the matter with thee?" said I.

"Sir," he stammered, "the Huguenots are gathered in Mr. Etienne's mill before the Carmelite gate in forbidden worship."

I was much frightened. So it was betrayed.

"And what else?" exclaimed I.

"The mill is surrounded by dragoons. All are captured. Just think, the Marshal de Montreval is there in person. The preacher and others of the captured heretics would escape through the window, thereupon the marshal gave a signal, and the dragoons fired."

"Fired?" I cried. "Was any one killed?"

"Four of them lay dead on the spot," answered the servant.

Without further questions I seized cane and hat. Clementine wept and trembled. She would not let me go. She was pale. She lost her speech, and hung with mute anxiety on my neck.

Madame de Sonnes appeared. I related to her the horrible occurrence, and made my resolution known to her—to hasten thither, in order to move the marshal to pity. She praised my determination, asked me herself, without delay, to hasten there, and spoke quieting words to Clementine.

I went to the threshold. I looked back once more to Clementine, saw her pale and trembling in the lap of her mother, went back, kissed her pale lips, and hurried away.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER VIII.

CONCERNING THE CUSTOMS OF THE JEWS UNDER THEIR MELCHI, OR LITTLE KINGS, AND UNDER THEIR PRIESTS UP TO THE TIME OF THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM BY THE ROMANS.

The Jews took a king in spite of the priest Samuel. But Samuel appointed one in order that he might preserve his usurped authority, yet he had the hardihood to say that to take a king is to renounce God (Samuel viii, 7). Finally a shepherd who was looking for his asses was elected by lot. The Jews were then under the yoke of the Philistines. They had not yet built a temple. Their sanctuary, as we hav observed, was a chest which they carried in a wagon. The Philistines captured the ark. God, who was very much irritated at the Philistines, nevertheless had allowed them to capture the ark. But, in order to avenge himself, he inflicted the piles upon the conquerors and sent a plague of mice into their country. The conquerors appeased God by returning his ark, together with five golden mice and five golden emerods (Samuel vi, 4). There was no vengeance or peace-offering more worthy of the God of the Jews. He pardoned the Philistines, but he "smote of the people fifty thousand three score and ten," because they looked into the ark (Samuel xi, 19).

It is under such agreeable circumstances as these that Saul is elected king of the Jews. There was neither buckler nor lance in their little country. The Philistines only permitted the Jews, their slaves, to sharpen the shares of their plows and their axes. They were compelled to do the work of the Philistines for their slight protection, and yet, so it is related, Saul the king gathered an army of three hundred thousand men, by whom he gained a great battle (Samuel xi). Gulliver tells similar stories, but never makes such contradictions.

Saul, in another battle, received the parole of the pretended king of Agag. The priest Samuel coming up on the part of the Lord said, "Why hav you not killed all?" and then taking a sacred cleaver he hewed Agag into pieces (Samuel xv, 32). If this is true, what sort of people were the Jews, and what kind of priests did they hav?

Saul, reproved by the Lord because he had not hewed the king Agag, his prisoner, in pieces, went into another battle against the Philistines, after the death of that amiable priest Samuel. He consulted a woman who was endowed with the Phythian spirit, and who was able to make ghosts appear. The sorceress showed Saul the ghost of Samuel which came out of the ground (Samuel xxviii). But this is only regarded as a part of the beautiful Jewish philosophy. Deduce its moral and see what it leads to.

A player of the harp upon whom the eternal being had centered his affections is consecrated king during the lifetime of Samuel. He revolts against his sovereign, and, as the sacred book says, all those whose affairs were bad, who were swallowed up by debts, and were wicked in spirit, assembled on his side (Samuel xxvii).

This man was after God's own heart. So the first thing which is necessary to be done is to assassinate a tenant by the name of Nabal, who refused to assist with contribution. David married his widow. He also married eighteen women, not counting his concubines. He fled to king Achish, an enemy of his country. There he was well-received, and in order to recompense the king for his kindness, he sacks the villages of the allies of Achish. He slaughters everything without even sparing the infants at the breast, which was at least according to the custom demanded by the Jewish rites. David then pretends to king Achish that he only sacked some Jewish villages (Samuel xxvii, 9-12). We must admit that highway robbers are less guilty in the eyes of man; but the ways of the God of the Jews are not our ways.

The good King David steals the throne from Ishbosheth, the son of Saul. He assassinates Mephibosheth, the son of his protector Jonathan. He delivered to the Gibeonites the two children of Saul, and five of his own, in order that he might hang them all. He assassinated Uriah in order to cover up his adulterous connection with Bathsheba. This abominable Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, was the grandmother of Jesus Christ.

The following, from the history of the Jews, is made up of consecrated crimes. Solomon begins by killing his brother Adonijah. If God bestowed upon Solomon the gift of wisdom, it seems that he refused him the gift of humanity, justice, and respect for laws. He had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. The songs which are imputed to him are on a par with those immodest books which make the depraved blush. For therein he has spoken of the breasts, of the navel like a round goblet, and the belly like an heap of wheat; he has spoken of voluptuous attitudes, of embracements, and of passionate desire, and finally says: "What shall we do for our little sister. She hath no breasts. If she be a wall we will build upon her; if she be a door we will inclose her."

Such is the custom of the wisest man of the Jews, in whom there is less cultivation than is generally imputed to him by the miserable rabbis and absurd Christian theologians.

Finally, in order to conceal the hight of folly, with that extreme impurity, a popish sect has decided that the belly of the Shulamite and her parts, her breasts, and her navel, are the emblems and the types of the marriage of Jesus Christ with his church.

Among all the kings of Judah and Samaria, there were very few who were not either assassins, or assassinated. Even that crowd of brigands who massacred one another in public places and in the temple, while Titus besieged them, fell under the sword and yoke of the Romans, just as all the rest of that petty people of God, who had been scattered over Asia for so long a time. Each head of Jews was valued and sold for the price of a sow, an animal less impure than such people, if what their historians and their prophets relate is true.

No one can deny that the Jews wrote those abominable works. It turns our stomach to examin such work closely. These are, forsooth, the heralds of providence, the precursors of the reign of Jesus Christ! All Jewish history, you tell me, O Abaddie! is a prophecy of the church. All the prophets predict Christ. Let us examin the prophets.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE NATURE OF TRUTH.

The first, and perhaps the most important, result of the Copernican astronomy was a mental change, viz., the discovery of the nature of truth. There immediately began an entire reversal of method in looking at nature. The conviction of advanced minds became more and more settled that truth was the fruit of scientific observation or experiment, and of that only. Truth is really a modern discovery or invention. It is still the property only of the more advanced parts of the race, and of those only in proportion as the methods and results of science have become appreciated. But it was the true explanation of the earth, sun, and stars, that first laid the foundations of this new method immovably in the minds of mankind. The acceptance of Descartes' "Discourse on Method" marked this result. Theology made doubt a sin. Descartes made it a duty—the prerequisite of all true knowledge, the foundation of all Science.

The old method of revelation, faith, and authority was faced by the simple method of science; and the issue was not only joined, but the victory was won, in this first great Cosmic contest. Truth was felt to be entirely different from what had been supposed, and from what had been taught by theologians and metaphysicians. It was no longer the revelations of a God, distilled down through the church and imparted by authority, to be accepted by "faith" only. It was found to be the concordance of thoughts with external things and laws. It was the acquisition and the common property of the whole human race, to be extended by human energy and adventure, and tested by human experience. It belonged to no pope, council, or school In the times past it had been hard to tell what truth was. There had been no test of truth except divine authority. And what was the test of that? Theology!

Even the mathematical sciences were supposed to rest upon theology and metaphysics for their test of truth instead of upon the uniform, universal, and inherited experience of mankind. Besides mathematics, there had been, previous to the spread of Christianity, no little scientific progress in astronomy and physics; but that knowledge had been overgrown and had nearly disappeared during the dark ages with their mildew of the method of faith.

It it true that, for about two hundred years prior to 1600, the twilight had begun to appear, but it was not until the discoveries of the astronomers, navigators, and scientists we have mentioned had truly opened up the real earth and the true heavens, that the fragments of the old truth were married to the new by the rise and use of the positive method of verification. Truth, as the word is now understood, was then really born. In consequence of this discovery, science, the embodiment of truths tested and known upon its own method, began to be organized, and to stand forth as undoubtedly the greatest victory and the greatest good the human race has ever achieved.

Its rise is indeed the turn of the leaf between the old and the new in history. The knowledge thus gathered, tested, and combined upon the positive method remains as the one solid rock upon which the future of our race must rest. It is the grand treasure which generations past unconsciously contributed to make the common capital and patrimony of countless generations to come. What duty, what pleasure, can be higher than to use and thereby to pass this common light to the coming heirs of time!

Before this method, and its gradually extending results, the methods of revelation, inspiration, intuition, faith, authority, hope, and belief—that is to say, of theology, in all its forms and phases—appear only as illusions, or unverified assertions.

By this method the "tree of knowledge," of which theology forbade man to eat, has become his tree of life—his Tree Igdrasyl—ever growing, blossoming, and bearing fruit. It covers and explains all. It is limited only by the capacities of man. Those who tell of other limits tell us of their ignorance. When it is seen to be "religious" in its very fiber and growth, the whole earth may well become a Paradise Regained, replacing more than a thousand-fold the little Eden-paradise its first fruit was fabled to have lost.

That we do not mistake the real date of the instauration of the scientific method appears from the voice of one who together with Shakspere is becoming known as the great Poet of the birth of the New Era. In Goethe's wonderful poem "Inheritance" (Vermachtniss) the date is clearly given in a verse which reads, literally, in this wise:

"The True was found long ago;
A noble brother band has it bound.
To the known True hold firmly on;
Thank for it, son of earth, the wise one
Who showed the earth to circle the sun,
And for the sister-planets marked the paths."

The "wise one," the translators and commentators tell us, was "the sage" Copernicus;* rather, let us say, it is a collective name for all of the sages we have named, to whom our knowledge of the new world is due. It was this knowledge that confirmed the change of method, and gave us truth and science, not dropping from the skies, but rising from and resting upon the earth and man. It gave us also the bold, adventurous England of Elizabeth and James, with the soul of Shakspere, the precursor of the great German Literature, in which for the first time "all human aspiration was set free."

The second great harmony of the gospel we may call the great physical change, also to be dated from the year 1600. It is this:

II.—THAT THE WORLD WAS THEN DISCOVERED AND DECLARED TO BE A COSMOS, BUT NOT A UNIVERSE.

This was the greatest revolution that man ever underwent as to the physical world about him. It resulted from the complete reversion of his astronomy, which is the fundamental physical science—the base of all the sciences. This change is far from being realized even now in its consequences.

The fact was that, under the telescope, the Universe, and its Heaven and its God, vanished into Infinity. In its stead was revealed a beautiful Cosmos, with the sun of our planetary system as its center, all moving according to ascertainable law. It is hardly 275 years since this began to be seen and clearly felt by a few. The many are gradually coming to realize it and its consequences. All the great changes since 1600 in science, religion, politics, and society, in order to be understood, must be traced back to this fundamental revolution. Let us consider it for a moment. Before that date (1600) our earth was the fixed center of a universe turning about it, and carrying within it a solid firmament of spheres, studded with sun, moon, and stars, made expressly for man's benefit. Above the seven or twelve heavens of that firmament a Creator lived, and from his throne of grace, or of wrath, watched, and now and then changed the course of his cunning creation, as his glory or caprice, or the good or punishment of his faithful creatures, prompted. Under the new astronomy all this suddenly passed away. By the aid of Galileo, Bruno, and others, the Copernican System became confirmed, published, and known. There was the earth and the sun and stars and infinity, but no firmament! no universe!

Giordano Bruno lectured in England and on the Continent, not only in support of the Copernican system in its simple form, but of the more terrible and fruitful truth, as he stated it, of "The Stability of the Heavens and the Infinity of the Universe (i. e., of space) and of Worlds;" and soon the telescope of Galileo opened up this infinity to the human eye. The importance and real meaning of these discoveries may be judged from their reception by the church. Theology saw the crisis at once, and applied the most conclusiv arguments of her method—denial, repression, persecution, torture, and death! Copernicus concealed his discovery until he could send out his book containing it from his deathbed. But theology would not be entirely defeated by death—his book, if not his body, was burned and the ashes scattered to the winds.

*See Goethe's "Werke" (Hempel's edition), vol. ii, p. 191. Dwight's translation of "Minor Poems of Goethe and Schiller" (Boston, 1839), p. 153.

The story of Galileo is too well known to need repetition. He was imprisoned, and scarcely kept from the rack and stake by his extreme old age, his most humiliating retraction, and the political influence of the enlightenment of Italy and Europe. But Bruno, the proclaimer of the stability of the heavens, of infinite space, and of infinite worlds, could not be saved. After three years of the cruelest imprisonment and tortures, he was burned alive at Rome on the 16th of February, 1600. His words when he was sentenced to the flames were inspired by the prophecy, or, rather, the prevision, of science: "Perhaps," he said, "it is with greater fear that you pass this sentence upon me than I receive it." It is impossible to read the story of this cruel torture and murder, perpetrated upon one of the first scholars of that age, without horror and indignation. But ought these holy fathers to be blamed? "The holy fathers" did no more than the duty of their method—did it, apparently, judging from Bruno's reply, with fear and hesitation. The Christian faith with its "love of God" forced them by its inexorable logic. They were probably honest, and also able and far-seeing men. For they foresaw the fact, which has been confirmed more and more, that every creed, with its dependent polity and civilization, is founded upon its astronomy, that is, its cosmogony—rests upon it, indeed, as a building upon its foundation. For astronomy has always been the first and the fundamental physical science of every "religion." Reverse that, and a new philosophy, and then a new religion, and then a new polity, and then a new civilization, is the result. They felt instinctively and correctly that the new astronomy was sweeping into the nowhere of infinity the very foundations of their Christian faith, and the throne of their God. They did not, and could not, foresee that though the old heavens vanished, a new civilization of peace, industry, and true human "religion" might spring from the hearts of men upon the earth. Theology was thus called to fight for its life. It was a war against science and the independence of the human soul—a struggle still continued. For three hundred years theology made torture a fine art, and murder, by burning alive, its common sacrament, its act of faith (auto-da-fè) to vindicate the method of faith. The facts of the crusades, persecutions, and wars of Christian monotheism are in danger of being forgotten. To become but partly acquainted with them is to turn in horror and disgust from the method and the creed of war, blood, and torture.

But we must be careful not to unjustly blame those Christian fathers and Presbyters. Their faith rested well and firmly upon the old astronomy. The world as they and all men, prior to 1600, saw it had in fact, as we now know, come down to them from the simple observations and the abundant imagination of savage ancestors; but they thought it had been revealed to them from a Creator in the heaven just above them. We can never understand theology except as a part of their old astronomy. In it, sight and faith confirmed each other. They saw as savages and children now do, that they were clearly standing on the earth, which was the firm center of the revolving heaven above them. This they called the mundus universus—the universe. The etymology of this word universe gives its true meaning, and the key to all monotheistic theologies. It is the Latin word meaning that which turns around its center (uni, of one, and versus, the turning, from verto, I turn). That is, the world was conceived of as one whole mass or system, turning upon the earth as its center.

The universe, then, was one mighty revolving sphere, carrying with it the sun and stars, and all that is. Theology is simply the philosophy of this false astronomy. It is the attempted explanation of the origin and of the working of this supposed but non-existent universe. It is easy to follow the story through from those given premises, for the universe turned upon its center, the earth. It followed from this that the universe was limited, and finite, and circular. For a rotating infinity is impossible and unthinkable. Aristotle had made this clear enough to all Mohammedans and Christians in his treatise on the "Heaven." But it did not require a philosopher to see that a rotating infinity was as impossible as an infinite circle, or square, or triangle. The rotating universe was therefore certainly limited. Equally certain was it that every known motion had some cause. Everything was plainly made and sustained by something and some will. There must, then, be something or some will outside of the limited rotating universe to move it, sustain it, and account for it. But to be and to do this, that sustaining power must be independent of the universe, and outside of it. The matter of the universe was therefore supposed to be dead and unable to exert power of and by itself. Much less could a vacuum outside of the revolving limited universe cause its motion, though Atheistic Aristotle seems to have supposed this external space to be a vacuum. There was no choice then left but to suppose this external factor to be mind, for to them mind, matter, or nothing were the only factors to choose from.

But mind and will are always attributes of a person. The space beyond the universe could only be thought of as infinite. Hence the mind and will filling and dwelling in this infinity must be infinite, and also one, for there cannot be two infinities. The creator and governor of the universe was therefore one infinite personal being. Thus the monotheistic theory followed as the direct and logical result of the old cosmogony, which presented the "universe" as the theory of the world surrounding man. As soon as astronomy had shown that this "universe" was a mere illusion of man's senses, the theology resting upon it was seen by thinkers to be merely the results of that illusion of his senses. The only remedy was, as far as possible, to prevent thinking, and that is the only remedy now.

A Case to Fight.

The time has gone by when the officials of most countries would dare to make a fight against heresy on Paine's and Voltaire's works, but it seems that Canada is still dragging along, imagining that the mists of the dark ages yet envelop the world. We had fondly hoped that there was but one scoundrel in the world so contemptibly bigoted as Anthony Comstock, or so utterly reckless in his disregard of others' rights to read what they please, but we are undeceived. They hav one in Canada; yes, two. The collector of customs at Toronto, Ont., and the minister of customs at Ottawa, Ont., are still swathed in the clothes of the church and unable to distinguish between the duty they owe their government and the people of Canada and their blind allegiance to the church. They inject their private opinions into their decisions as government officials.

The case in point is this: On the 19th of last month we received an order from Mr. W. B. Cooke, of Toronto, for six "Age of Reason" and six "Pocket Theology." We filled the order, sent the bill, and on the 24th Mr. Cooke presented the invoice at the Custom House to pay duty on them. The official, Mr. Scanlon, said he must detain them till he heard from Ottawa. On the next Saturday Mr. Cooke called to learn by what authority the books were held, and he was informed that the parcel was confiscated by the minister of customs at Ottawa, and that all "such like" books would in future be confiscated. Minister of customs is a good title by which to designate such an arbitrary and bigoted official. Ministers hav ever been popish in their decisions. "I am an agent of the Lord; I am infallible," is the burden of their song. And the minister of customs, a government official, echoes the cry. Under the English government the church and state are united. And the Ottawa puppy is only logical in making his decision as a government official subservient to his views as a churchman. Duty to "God" in the Romish and English churches is before allegiance to country and man. It was because he held these views that Torquemada burnt with a clear conscience every heretic he could lay his hands on. It is in carrying out these views that the minister of customs burns the works of Voltaire and Paine. "God above government!" is the cry of the bigot. And it is this feeling which the church so assiduously endeavors to instill that has been the cause of so much bloodshed. Reading heretical works in olden times was punished with death. The idea of an Index Expurgatorius was conceived in Rome, but it has found its way across the water. We do not know whether the Toronto Custom House has one or not, but if it has, as Mr. Cooke says, it should be made known. It would save much heresy hunting, which is irritating to both the public and the trade. We do not at present know where to draw the line, as our best literature, both books and magazines, is more or less tainted with heresy and liable to be detained by Custom officials. The present outrageous seizure is not only against liberty and reason, but it is without shadow of law. It is a usurpation of authority by petty officials who imagin they are little Almightys, and doing the big Almighty a great service by suppressing works which may lead people to suppose that his services to mankind hav been slightly overrated. By this decision the Canadian public is at the mercy of every "tuppence ha'-penny" official who may chocse to take advantage of his position. It is an outrage upon every citizen of Canada, whether he believes in the doctrins of Voltaire and Paine or not. The government is now Episcopal, which is regarded as heretical by the Romish church. Supposing the state religion of England should change, as it has several times within the last thousand years, and the Catholic church should be allied with the English throne, how then would our little Ottawa and Toronto popes feel? Everything in conflict with Rome would be thrown out, and if the customs collector and the customs minister wanted their favorit books or papers they would be obliged to smuggle them into the province. It is good to know that there is some protest against the act of the customs collector and customs minister on the part of our Canadian neighbors. The press is outspoken in its abhorrence of this censorship. Although Christian papers, and therefore toning their remarks down so as not to offend their readers, they see the principle involved and make a vigorous protest against the Custom House encroachments upon the people's right to read what they like. The Toronto Evening Telegram says:

"Our news columns on Saturday informed the public that the collector of customs at this port had, on his own responsibility, seized a consignment of books which he adjudged prejudicial to the morals of the community, the seizure being approved by the minister of customs, when he was subsequently appealed to. The books which were seized were Paine's 'Age of Reason' and Voltaire's 'Pocket Theology.' Knowing that the books are Theistical, one is at a loss to understand why they are branded Atheistical and denied circulation in Canada, when Bob Ingersoll's lecture, thoroughly Atheistical and Materialistic, are permitted free circulation.

"Tom Paine and Voltaire were counterparts of each other in belief, labor, and style of writing. It is questionable if two Theists ever lived who were more pronounced in their belief in a God than Paine and Voltaire. But they cordially hated the priests and the government of the church. An instance of this is to be found in Voltaire's definition of an Atheist: 'As a rule, an Atheist is any or every man who does not believe in the God of the priests.' It will be observed that Voltaire in the above definition does not deny the existence of a God, and no one can adduce a single sentence from his works to prove that he did not believe in a supreme power. Voltaire's unexampled powers of sarcasm were all directed against the priests, as when he says: 'By substituting the word priest for the word God, theology becomes the simplest of sciences. There is, of course, another and quite different God, but the priests hold him of little account. Theirs is the true one, and men must acknowledge him if they do not want to roast in the other world.' Paine believed in a God, too, but not in the God of popular theology. Any one can see this if he will read, not the tabooed 'Age of Reason,' but the famous 'Common Sense' pamphlet which was one of the most powerful influences making for the American Revolution, a book concerning which Major-General Lee wrote to George Washington, 'I never saw such a masterly, irresistible performance.' One sentence occurs to us in proof of our contention, 'Of more worth is one honest man to society, and in the sight of God, than all the crowned ruffians that ever lived.' So much for the belief of the men.

"The similarity of their labor can be seen when it is remembered that Voltaire was repeatedly banished from France for defending freedom of speech justice, and right. Paine not only wrote but moved the Declaration of Independence. He was one of the founders of the American republic, and had love enough of the right to enroll himself a member of the National Convention of France, in which capacity be came nigh losing his head.

"It is all very well for the authorities to be careful that polluted literature does not get into circulation, but if the authorities would begin their work of expurgation by suppressing those dime novels which set a pirate career before the youth as something commendable, the authorities would be doing something regarding the advisability of which there would be no two opinions. But when the authorities suppress two works which are part of the classic literature of the world, they assume the dignified attitude of people who try to sweep the ocean off the shore with a broom. If the government is to exercise a censorship over the mails and is to confiscate what, in its opinion, is prejadicial to the public interests, where is the matter to end? If Paine's works and Voltaire's works are held to be prejudicial to the public welfare, then the minister of customs must instantly issue an order for the confiscation of the much more Atheistical works of Comte, Hume, Kant, Hegel, Hamilton, Spencer, Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, etc.

"Apart from the merit of the action of the authorities, what is wholesome or unwholesome is for the courts to determin after argument made and answered."

The Toronto Globe, although considerably more Christian, is not a whit behind its neighbor in condemning the unwarrantable act. It comments thus:

"Our paternal government at Ottawa hav devised a new form of protection for the poor imbecils under their care. Not content with presenting to us feeble-minded Canadians what to eat and drink and wear, and where to purchase what we need in those lines, they are now undertaking to tell us what we may and may not read. The customs collector is henceforth to be also censor-absolute of imported literature, charged, we presume, with the duty of reading every book which comes from abroad, and confiscating all whose teachings are not sound. What a truth-fed, orthodox people we shall all become, sure enough! And how grateful we ought to be to our kind protectors at headquarters and to their dutiful servants, the customs collectors! In this bookmaking age there are few more difficult questions one has to decide than what to read and what not to read. We Canadians are to be perplexed no longer. The matter is taken out of our hands and settled for us. What a world of responsibility is thus lifted off our shoulders! And what intellectual and moral giants we shall become when we are no longer required to exercise our own faculties in order to discern between good and evil, but may read whatever we can get from abroad, assured that it is all right, else we couldn't hav got it. Nor is that all. Not only freedom from perplexity and responsibility, but absolute safety of course guaranteed. The wisest and best of us poor minors in intellect might make a mistake, but of course Mr. Patton and his fellow-collectors all over the dominion are infallible; and if they should happen to be in doubt, is there not the minister of customs to refer to? There is yet one serious defect, but that no doubt will be remedied in due time. Sological a government will quickly see the need of extending their fatherly oversight to the presses as well as the custom houses of the dominion, and appointing another set of infallible censors to see that the infantil Canadian mind is not poisoned by error from these sources. Then, as we nav said, what an orthodox people we shall become!

"Seriously, we hav heard of nothing more preposterously absurd for a long time than the confiscation by the collector of customs at this port of a half dozen copies each of Paine's 'Age of Reason' and of Voltaire's 'Pocket Theology.' And to think that such an act of childish zeal should hav been sanctioned and fathered by the authorities at Ottawa! We hav rubbed our incredulous eyes long and hard enough over it, but in vain. There it is in black and white, and vouched for. In the first place, as an act of policy it is the most ill conceived and stupid imaginable. The books hav long since been cast out of the currents of thought. They hav no longer any appreciable influence. The copies in question must hav been ordered for the library of some scholar or antiquarian for the purpose of comparing the waifs of the past with those of later days. But if the object had been to revive interest in dead issues which they present, and to advertise them anew to the curiosity of a skeptical age, no better means could hav been devised. The importer will, of course, and rightly, refuse to submit to so arbitrary an invasion of his rights of property. By the time the matter has been ventilated in the courts the curiosity of young Canada will hav been stimulated to the utmost, and hundreds will want to find out for themselvs what is so dreadfully objectionabble in the proscribed books.

"And then, again, the act is utterly wrong in principle. The day when any authority, civil or ecclesiastical, can interfere with the right of every man to use his own intellect and form his own opinions has gone by forever. The attempt itself is contrary to sound reason and to true religion. It certainly finds no sanction in the New Testament. The official mind in Toronto and Ottowa has become confused between two distinct things. The public wisely and for its own safety forbids the admission or circulation of a class of matter which appeals to the baser passions—those passions which, when over-stimulated or misdirected, become harmful and dangerous to society. On this principle instigations to murder and all the genus of obscene literature are rightfully excluded. But the line is clear enough for all practical purposes. It lies between appeals to the passions and appeals to the reason. Paine's and Voltaire's works belong to the latter class. Thousands of books and magazines containing articles tenfold more dangerous to religious faith are coming into the country every day. If Paine's Deism is to be excluded, what shall be done with the profound Atheism of many of these? The attempt to claim for government a censorship of the one or the other is simply ridiculous in this age of the world. No intelligent Christian or Christian minister will ask or approve of it. The forces of Infidelity must be met on their own ground. The appeal lies in every case to the individval intellect and conscience. Neither the Bible nor the laws of the land hav left the decision to custom house officers or political ministers."

While the Globe's estimate of Voltaire's and Paine's works is altogether erroneous, we are glad that it sees the principles involved. We would inform the Globe that Paine's works are more sought after now than ever before, and the same is the case with Voltaire's. They hav a great influence, and it is daily increasing. Apart from this error and its frequent appeal to the Bible, the Globe is very sound. Its editor is a Christian who sees beyond the length of his nose, but yet hates Paine and Voltaire, as every good Christian is commanded to do.

This a case which we hope will be fought out in the courts of Canada. If an official of the English government can usurp this authority it is time the people of the United States knew it. Such upstart interference with the literature of two countries is intolerable. In this country the bigots hav to cloak their efforts under the plea of suppressing obscenity, but under a government which lovingly hugs to itself a state church no such cloak seems to be needed. Probably that is the reason such strenuous efforts are made by the religious party of this country to get God recognized by the Constitution, and the church and the priests as his exponents and defenders.

We hope Mr. Cooke will push his case through all of the courts in Canada, if necessary, to overthrow this ruling of a minister of customs. We cannot think that the courts are as stupid as the collectors. There must be a little common sense somewhere among the judicial if not the civil officers, and it should be found and applied to just such cases as this.

The League Congress.

Lack of room alone prevented us from commending the work of the recent Congress in a previous paper. That it did good work is testified to by the efforts of its old enemies to belittle it. Without sacrificing any principle formerly contended for, it has adopted a platform big enough to take on all the former friends who left it because they thought its action bound them in some way to something they did not like. That this action would be misconstrued and made the basis of renewed attack by those disgruntled persons who read its proceedings only to find fault was to be expected. That it has their opposition is a sure sign that it is in the right.

It is of no use for Liberals to pull apart. Individual work is all well and good, and its effects cannot be overrated; but organization is the only means by which great objects can be attained. The bigoted powers will hardly heed what one man says, but let the protest be made by ten thousand, and the officials will bend their heads and listen with respect. Let a hundred thousand earnest, organized men demand a right hitherto kept from them by church or aristocratic rule, and it is granted. Supposing there were a National Liberal League in Canada numbering one hundred thousand, would the little customs collector of Toronto hav dared to confiscate the works of Voltaire and Paine? Would he hav boldly said that "all such" should in the future be consigned to the flames?

That there is work to be done that will be undertaken only by the Liberals no one can deny. And the Liberal League is the only organization not afraid of doing it. Heretofore it has been somewhat hampered by disagreements, but the disagreements were all for the best. The law of the survival of the fittest applies to all things. These disagreements hav weeded out the incompetents and the arrogant. Those who cannot work in an organization unless they are kingpins are better out. Their sincerity cannot but be questioned.

It has been given out by those whose wish was father to their thought that the League is now an organization on paper only. But it is not so. During the past year more money has been raised and expended than ever before in the same length of time; and by the report of the Secretary, which we published a short time ago, the other practical work is shown to be two or three times greater. The addition of the New York State Freethinkers' Association as an auxiliary is a good thing for the League and for the association. The resolutions passed are strong and satisfactory, and such as the whole Liberal body in the United States can work for. The resolution that the will of the majority does not bind the minority is eminently proper, for if Liberalism contends for any one thing it is for the right to think as we choose, and not be bound by any authority in the exercise of our reason. The other resolution, that the League reaffirm the resolution demanding the repeal of the so-called Comstock laws, is the expression of the voice of the majority of the League, as it undoubtedly is of the majority of Liberals of the United States. The justness of this demand, in view of past occurrences, is not a question for argument. It has been settled.

In parting with Mr. Wright as its presiding officer, the League can only regret that time will not let alone one so able and who has ever worked for the advancement of the human race. Elected at the critical period in the history of the League, he has never wavered in his allegiance to liberty. Through a storm of abuse that would hav made a less courageous man quail, so mean and bitter was it, he has stood manfully for right, never giving a hair's breadth nor surrendering one iota of principle for the sake of peace or policy. He has guided the League straight onward and has spoken in no uncertain tones. All hail to the grand old veteran! May the League and the Liberals hav the benefit of his counsel for many more years yet to come!

But his mantle has fallen upon one worthy to wear it. In T. B. Wakeman the League has a clear-headed President, who goes right down to the bed-rock. He is clear in his thought, firm in his convictions, and is not afraid to say what he thinks. He is a whole host in himself.

The other officers are all stanch and true Liberals, not easily stampeded. In selecting them the League did wisely and well. They will honor their offices as the League honored them in the choosing.

All in all, the League Congress of 1881 was a grand one. It has got down to solid secular work, and if its influence is not felt upon the country we shall be disappointed. There is a vast amount of work to be done, and it is growing more pressing all the time. The case of the Canada customs collector seems to us an eminently proper one for the League to take hold of. And there are questions arising every day in which the League can make its influence felt for liberty and right. The priests of this country are always insidiously working to undermine and overthrow our secular institutions. Let their efforts be met on all sides and thwarted. Let us work to perpetuate what our Infidel forefathers gave us—a secular government of, for, and by the people, without any ecclesiastical interference whatever.

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who hav sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books besides. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about next January for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There hav been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and, so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who hav read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early workers, but if that is divine justice poor fallible human beings cannot be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine a book as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back. Send on the V.'s.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

It is astonishing how mean some people and papers can be. Mr. B. F. Underwood has but recently stepped up and out of the editorial chair of the Index—and we understand he is going to permanently step down and into it again soon—and it must be presumed that the paper speaks with the knowledge of that eminent gentleman. In its issue of Oct. 13th we find a notice of Mr. Underwood's lectures, which we recently published—and first-class lectures and essays they are too—in which this statement stands out prominently: "The volume was published without Mr. Underwood's knowledge and consent." We can scarcely believe that Mr. Underwood ever authorized any one to say anything like this, in view of the fact that he did know that we were compiling the lectures into a book and himself sent us the "copy" with corrections marked in the margin. He knew Mr. Bennett's intention, approved of it, and conferred with him about it. For a paper so near the throne as the Index to say this has a very curious look. We hope Mr. Underwood did not write this notice himself.

The Yorktown anniversary exercises were opened with prayer. It would be interesting to know what prayer had to do with colonial success at the battle of Yorktown. If we are not mistaken it was conceded in Revolutionary times that the writings of Thomas Paine had more to do with stirring up the people than Jehovah himself. Judging by the ill-success of recent prayer experiments, prayer had but little to do with assuring us our independence, and it would hav been just as well to omit that part of the Yorktown exercises.

We would call attention to a new work we hav just issued, "Voltaire in Exile." It is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland, his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world by his brilliaut genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

We will fill orders as fast as they come, and hope to send off a good many. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

As the time slips by we are reminded that many subscribers to The Truth Seeker are getting in arrears. We hope they will not long remain so. The summer months are the dullest months with newspapers, and the receipts are the lighest, while the expenses are just as heavy as at any time. We hope those friends whose subscriptions hav expired will bear this fact in mind and renew at once without waiting for us to send them bills. It takes time and money to send out hundreds of bills, which would be unnecessary if all would watch their tab and remit promptly. We hope to hear from those in arrears right away.

W. F. Jamieson is busy in the lecture field. Send for him if you want a "revival" of Freethought. He has just given seven lectures in Kouts, Indiana, and five in Noblesville, Indiana, and is engaged to deliver a course of five in Union City, Michigan, early in November. Address, Albion, Mich.

The Liberal Free Press, recently suspended at Davenport, Iowa, under Comstock persecution, has been revived by Mr. Barter at Wheatland, Iowa. It is a small eight-page paper, at $1 per year, devoted to radical reforms. Mr. Barter deserves support, and we hope he will get it. Send him a stamp for a specimen copy.

George Chainey will make lecture engagements for week nights at any place within reach of Boston between Monday and Saturday. He must attend to his regular Infidel Pulpit work on Sunday, and on other days would like to do good for the cause outside of Boston by lecturing. No words of ours are needed to introduce him to Liberals or to vouch for his ability as a lecturer and orator. His terms are moderate. Address him at 51 Fort avenue, Boston (Roxbury), Mass.

Book Notice.

Natural Philosophy for London University matriculation. By Edward B. Aveling, D. Sc., fellow of University College, London. Dealing with all the required subjects, and containing over one hundred and fifty examples worked out in full, and some hundreds of exercises for solution by the students, with nearly two hundred figures of cuts. London: W. Stewart & Co. Price, $1.50.

This valuable work is by one of the most learned and promising young scientists and teachers of England, and one whom we hav the honor of claiming as a personal friend. He handles in a masterly manner Statics of solids—action of one force and of two forces; parallelogram of forces; forces acting upon a body; the two principles of momento; center of gravity; machines; wheel and axle; toothed wheels; the pulley; the inclined plane; the wedge; the screw; combination of machines; the simple machines and the principle of work. Statics of fluids—general principles; hydrostatics; specific gravity; pneumatics. Dynamics—moving bodies—terms employed; laws of motion; formulæ of moving bodies; special cases. Optics—the nature of light; reflection of light; refraction. Heat—the nature of heat and temperature; effects of heat; diffusion of heat.

The object of the work is to submit to students a brief treatis upon physics or natural philosophy, a subject which is studied by the general public in a far too limited degree. It is clear and concise in style, and cannot help proving of great value to those who study it. Those who wish the best lessons in natural philosophy—and every person should indulge that wish—will do well to avail themselvs of this work. It may be had at The Truth Seeker office.

D. M. B.

Our good friend, D. M. Bennett, editor of the New York Truth Seeker, will, by the time these lines reach the readers' hands, probably be again on his way round the world. During the last month he has been in London, waiting to take part in the Conference of the International Federation of Freethinkers. Mr. Bennett will carry away with him the heartiest good wishes of many English friends, for his genial humor and unaffected nature hav endeared him to all with whom he has come in contact. As an evidence of the feeling with which he is regarded in America, we subjoin an extract from a letter forwarded to us by a correspondent in America:

"Mr. D. M. Bennett is a gentleman to whom America and Americans owe more than they can repay. The reverence and veneration with which he is beginning to be treated by his countrymen will not obliterate the shameful stain upon our jurisprudence made by the indignities which, in the name of that jurisprudence, were wantonly put upon him. He was victimized by being made the defendant in a mock trial upon a frivolous charge before the corrupt Judge Benedict, whose personal integrity is as little respected as his legal opinions, and who will be remembered by his infamous decision, which led to the Winslow Extradition Controversy between our government and the English, and also as having perpetrated the most monstrous judicial atrocity upon a certain Mr. Lange. The judge, in connivance with some of the most degraded and depraved characters in our community, succeeded in getting Mr. Bennett into prison. An application signed by two hundred thousand Americans failed to move President Hayes to pardon Mr. Bennett, and he served out his full term of imprisonment. Upon his release he was the recipient of one of the most enthusiastic ovations ever tendered to any person in this city.

"Mr. Bennett has, at the desire of many of his friends, undertaken the tour of the planet, with a view of writing a book of his travels. You will find him full of varied information, as genial and affable as 'Uncle Toby,' and I hav no doubt you will take as much pleasure in conversing with him as I hav done.

"He is by no means the wicked person his enemies are trying to make him appear to be."—London Republican.

"Say, my lord," said Mr. D. M. Bennett, entering the splendidly furnished sanctum where, amid the perfumes of rare and costly exotics, the editor of the Republican gracefully reclined upon a couch of mother-of-pearl and velvet; "do you know where Yong-ngan-tcheou is? I hav to make a call there on my way around the world, and I guess I had better fix its location at once. I've worn out six maps looking for it, and can't find it anyhow." The editor touched the jeweled bell that stood at his side, and in prompt response to its summons, an Ethiopian page, clad in the rich and picturesque garb of the oriental, noiselessly stepped from behind the velvet hangings. "Bring 'Lett's Popular Atlas,'" murmured the editor. In a few minutes the slave reappeared, and handed a handsomely bound volume to his master. The copious index was referred to, and in one minute four and one-third seconds the mystery was solved, Yong-ngan-tcheou was found. D. M. Bennett at once registered an affirmation to take home a set of the 'Popular Atlas.'"—London Republican.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

London and Other English Towns.—Concluded.

THE ROYAL AQUARIUM

Is a place of decided interest. It is located at the foot of the cliff of the Marine Parade, and near the Channel. It is constructed beneath the surface of the earth, is 715 feet in length, and 100 feet wide. It is divided into a spacious entrance room and corridors, on each side of which are capacious tanks for fishes, well supplied with stone-work in the rear, and heavy plate-glass fronts. The largest of these tanks is 110 feet long, and contains 110,000 gallons of water. Here usually disported a porpoise or two; but as they are hard to keep alive in confinement, I had not the opportunity of looking at them. The other tanks, however, are well supplied with rare fish of many kinds, among which may be named different varieties of crabs, shrimp, prawn, mackerel, herrings, trout, bass, eels, salmon, pickerel, cod, sturgeon, bullheads, skate, sea-turtles, and numerous other kinds, amounting, in the aggregate, to fifteen thousand. They are divided into different tanks, according to character and disposition. It is very interesting to watch them and see the various forms of finny life. The lobsters and crabs walk around at the bottom of the tanks and look as sober and dignified as a deacon. The shrimp and prawn have a semi-transparent appearance. The skate, a flat, thin fish of very queer appearance, comes close to the glass and presents a full front face, as if looking out of the window. Yes, face it is, and it bears not a little resemblance to the human face, grotesque as it is. The octopus is the strangest of all the inhabitants of the tanks. It has life, and moves from place to place, and acts as if breathing, but it has no head, no eyes, and apparently no organs, and is little more than loose jelly. It is evidently a very low form of animal life.

The large tanks containing sea-anemones are really beautiful submarine flower-gardens. They look like flowers, and are permanently located on a rock or elsewhere, but nevertheless show signs of animal life. There is a great variety of them, as also of the coral tribe. The telescope fish, from Shanghai, are very singular; they are restless creatures, and seem to be trying to turn themselves inside out. Three or four alligators are in a compartment by themselves. If doing nothing is an art, these scaly saurians have certainly acquired it, for they lie motionless for hours together. Probably if they were where the sun could pour its warm rays down upon them new life would be infused into them. The two sea-lions—of the seal tribe—occupy a tank by themselves, and are in constant exercise, swimming, diving, and leaping up on the ledge next to the spectators, from whom they are separated by an iron fence. They eat about fifty pounds of food each per day, consisting of fish of various kinds.

The Aquarium may be considered a somewhat extensive boarding house, and to feed the numerous guests the following bill of fare is weekly provided: sixteen quarts of shrimp, containing 35,500; six quarts of tiny sand-hoppers, collected from decaying sea-weeds, thrown up by the tide; fifteen quarts of live log-worms; eight quarts of earth-worms; twelve thousand fish of various kinds; five hundred crabs, with a due supply of a variety of other denizens of the sea. To gather these requires the steady labor of two or three men, besides what is brought from the fish-markets of London.

Within the Aquarium are conservatories, ferneries, fountains, cascades, and a large room for theatrical performances, concerts, etc. On the top is a fine promenade, with flower-gardens, and other curiosities, among the living ones being a large eagle, a brown bear, etc. At the entrance is a fancy tower-like structure, with arches and a slender spire, in which a clock with four dials tells of the time to the loungers on the beach.

THE PAVILION

Is an extensive structure, located in beautiful grounds, and is a place of resort. It was built by George IV. when he was prince of Wales, and was used by him as a residence. In 1849 the corporation of Brighton bought it of the crown for the sum of $265,000, since when it has been used for public purposes. The lower rooms are well adapted for public meetings and balls,, and in the upper part is a museum of Chinese and other antiquities, among which are many curiosities well worth the attention of the sight-seer. The building has a stone front, 200 feet long, and nearly in the center a dome, in the oriental style, 130 feet high. The magnificent royal stables—built in the Moorish style—for the horses of the prince, have been converted into a magnificent concert hall, known as the Dome, capable of accommodating three thousand persons. A large fine-looking dome surmounts the edifice. The grounds in front are beautiful, and decorated with floral beauties. The whole place is decidedly interesting.

PORTSMOUTH.

Thinking I had seen enough of the beauties of the fashionable town of Brighton, at 6: 30 P.M. I took the train for Portsmouth, some forty-five miles west of Brighton, also located on the English Channel. The train was slow, and did not reach Portsmouth till nearly nine o'clock. But in the station Mr. and Mrs. John Brumage, who had been apprised of my intended visit, were awaiting me, and invited me at once to their home. They are a very worthy, intelligent people, of my own way of thinking, and we soon began to feel at home in each other's society.

My particular object in visiting Portsmouth was to see the extensive government dockyards there located, the largest in the world, for constructing war steamers, and to visit some of the steamers ready for sea. Portsmouth is a town of 130,000 inhabitants, and is of decidedly different character from Brighton—the former being a place of business, the latter of fashion and pleasure. There are from fifteen to twenty thousand soldiers stationed at Portsmouth, and about the same number of sailors. The property here belonging to the government is very extensive.

Mr. Brumage is storekeeper of naval supplies in government employ, and has been for many years. He has under his supervision a vast amount of articles used in the naval services, as well as for construction. These supplies are drawn for other points on the coast of England, as well as to various ports among her colonies in all parts of the world. Among the supplies usually kept on hand are 40,000 gallons olive oil, 17,000 illuminating oil, 120,000 pounds of tallow, 50 tons of pitch, 4,000 gallons of turpentine, 2,000 barrels of tar, 160,000 yards of canvas, 5,500 flags of all nations, 120,000 tons of iron and steel in the various forms for working, 500 anchors, the heavier weighing 5,000 pounds, 8,000 tons of chain cable, the longest of which the links are a foot in length, and of round iron two and a half inches in diameter, 500 tons of steel wire, rope, and hawsers for vessels, 180 tons of brass tubing, 150 tons of zinc, 70 tons of rivets, 45 tons of copper, 300 tons cordage, all sizes, 20,000 tons of coal, 100 tons of paints and painting material, of timber of different kinds and from various parts of the world an immense supply, 500 small boats, 50 tons of engineers' furnace geer, 100 torpedoes, together with a great multitude of other articles too numerous to mention. These are stowed away in the best of order, I think, in some eighty storehouses of large size, some of them 800 feet in length, with a cellar under a great share of them. They are classified carefully, so that each line of articles are by themselves. Each building has a sub-keeper, who is held responsible for the order and safe keeping of the articles under his charge. Nearly 500 men are under Mr. Brumage's charge.

A large amount of discarded articles are constantly being collected in here from various parts of the service, and these are sold off at auction at stated periods. On the 6th inst. a sale was held, in which the following articles, in 1,171 lots, were disposed of: 120 tons hemp rope, 173 tons shakings, 12 tons old canvas, 12 tons painted canvas, 2 tons chains, 24 tons coal sacks, bags, wrappers, etc., 10 hundred weight old bunting, 18 tons old brass, 6 tons zinc, 70 tons steel scrap, 6 tons steel tools, 3 tons old files, 145 tons wrought and cast iron, 24 tons shafting, 24 tons old chain, 25 tons wire rigging, 34 tons messenger chain, 5 tons railway bar iron, 14 tons galvanized bolts, blocks, and stays, 47 hundred weight old rubber, 200 loads oak and other woods, 66,500 oak-tree nails, and a great number of other articles.

Mr. Brumage and myself walked around the yards, which comprise many hundreds of acres. There are fourteen large stone docks, suitable for building the largest ocean war steamers, four of them being now in course of construction. There are also three very large basins which have been excavated at great expense and walled in, in which many vessels can be stored away from the effects of the waves, and where they can unload and load in perfect safety. He took me up into the lookout, or observatory, where two old tars are located to keep up a constant watch for what vessels may come into the harbor and to report the same by telegraph at headquarters. Here several large naval glasses are kept pointed in different directions. The Isle of Wight lies five miles south of Portsmouth and helps to form a very extensive and excellent harbor. Through the glasses a fair view of the island could be obtained. The island is twenty or thirty miles in length and a third of that distance in width. It is represented as a good farming country.

I was also taken on board the East Indian transport steamer Jumna, one of the five large steamers for transporting troops whenever they may be wanted. It is to leave soon with 1,400 troops for some point in India. Among the passengers are to be one hundred women, who are employed at flag-making and other work.

In the harbor at anchor lies the Victory, the warship on which Lord Nelson was wounded and on which he died. The very spot where he fell, and the blood which stained the deck, are pointed out. The old veteran warship is superseded by the ironclads, and it is now used as a training-ship for boys learning the naval service. There are others of the old wooden navy at anchor in the harbor, used for the same purpose.

I had a sail in a government yacht, in the harbor, among the hulks, used for storing coal for the steamers, and others for the use of soldiers when being transferred from one part of the service to another. Sometimes a regiment or two of soldiers are kept on these hulks for two or three weeks.

Mr. Brumage took me on board the iron war steamer Inflexible, one of the largest and heaviest in the service, having a heavy armor plating, and all the latest improvements in the iron war steamer line. This is what I wished to see, one of the large iron war steamers fully equipped and ready for service. I will give some of the dimensions and other particulars pertaining to her: Length, 320 feet; breadth, 75 feet; tonnage, 11,085 tons; draught of water, 24½ feet; horse-power of engines, 8,000; number of crew, 484 men.

I fear I will be illy able to describe this magnificent, expensive, and complicated affair, but I assure you it is a wonder of the first magnitude. An assistant engineer took us over the entire ship and showed us the great amount of machinery, appliances, etc., which are now requisite for a first-class war steamer. The center part of the steamer is a vast and complicated machine-shop—engines, pipes, rods, pumps, and the various contrivances are in place, and every foot of room seems to be occupied. There are in all forty-two engines on the steamer, some for pumping, some for manufacturing electric light, and others for various purposes which I cannot make known to you, because I do not know. The electric light is being manufactured by three processes—Brusch's, Grommer's, and another which I have forgotten. The interior of the ship under deck, and much of it under the water-line, is lighted by electricity, so that away down in the hold twenty feet below the water it is as light as day. Fresh air is pumped down into all parts of the vessel, so that every portion of it has an abundance of pure, fresh air. This is a great improvement, as with bad and confined air the health of the men would soon be destroyed. Speaking tubes traverse all parts of the ship, and reach every considerable person on duty. I think the engineer told me there were twenty miles of pipe there in use in all.

The Inflexible has two turrets, each about thirty feet in diameter, and each turret has two eighty-ton guns of the most approved make. The turrets are manipulated by hydraulic power. Each turret describes a whole circle, so that either gun can be discharged in any direction in the outer half circle. The ammunition is kept in strong magazines low down in the center part of the ship. In time of engagement the charge and shot are brought out of the magazine on an iron car, which runs on a track to the elevator, which raises it to the mouth of the gun. When the gun is discharged the turret is moved around to where the elevator is, the gun is drawn back, and the muzzle of it is dropped some two feet inside the turret, so that while the charge and the conical shot are being put in it is not in danger from the shot of the enemy. As the shot weighs some twelve hundred pounds, the arrangement for lifting it to the mouth of the gun is indispensable. In addition to the four large guns are several of the small complex guns, having each four barrels, for rapid firing with small shot, to pick off men from the enemy and to prevent boarding.

The bunkers for the coal will hold some two thousand tons. The galleys for the men, where the cooking and eating are done, are light and commodious, and are also kept clean. The cooking is done on a range of very large proportions. An extensive apparatus for distilling and condensing ocean water insures a full supply of pure water at all times. The hospital for the sick men is fitted up very comfortably and is light and airy. The officers' quarters are of course fitted up in the neatest and richest manner. Their portion of the steamer seems a perfect palace.

The armor over the citadel, the central portion of the ship, is fourteen inches in thickness, under which is thirty inches of teak wood. The deck is double plated, between which are several inches in thickness of cork. With the exception of the wood under the plating and the cork under the outer plate, almost everything is of iron or steel, even to the stairs which lead from one deck to another. An arrangement is had so that in an engagement water can be let in in such quantities as to sink the vessel so that much less of her surface will be exposed to the fire of the enemy. I should, however, fear this operation, lest with such a vast amount of iron it would go down to the bottom altogether. The hull is made into independent compartments, each perfectly tight, so that if one or two of the compartments fore or aft are shattered all to pieces the center part will still securely float.

I was not a little interested in the torpedo part of the armament. Twenty-four torpedoes constitute the quota for a war steamer. They are made of metal, from twelve to fifteen feet in length, a foot through in the center and tapering to a point at each end, somewhat in the shape of a very slim cigar. The explosive material is placed in the torpedo just before it is sent on its mission of destruction. There are three ways by which the torpedoes are sent to their destined object—an enemy's ship; the first is a torpedo boat made of light metal, some twenty feet long, covered all over, so that the men are not exposed, capable of carrying ten men to manipulate the engine, the torpedo, and the boat. When within a proper distance of the enemy, the torpedo is set to explode in a given number of seconds or minutes, as the case may be, and is then forcibly expelled by compressed air through an opening for the purpose in the end of the torpedo boat, it shooting under water, some hundreds of feet, while the boat which brought it retires to a place of safety. The second plan is to elevate the torpedo on to a tall shute at the very bow of the boat, the descent a part of the way approaching the perpendicular, the torpedo acquires such momentum as to send it several hundred feet to the object it is designed to destroy. The third mode is to discharge them from the body of the ship some six feet or more below the surface of the water. In the discharge a tremendous force is employed to give the torpedo a powerful send off, and for this purpose a steel rod is used which telescopes out to the length of thirty feet, imparting great force to the departing missile, to accelerate which compressed air within it operates a screw in the stern of the torpedo. The angel of vengeance is supposed thus to fly beneath the water a distance of nearly a thousand feet.

I saw the torpedoes in place ready for charging and discharging, but it would seem that in handling in a state of excitement such fearfully dangerous materials as dynamite and other terrible explosives, and by inexperienced persons, the danger might be quite as great to the persons handling them as to the enemy a thousand feet or two away. In fact the whole steamer seems too complicated and intricate for a killing machine. It would do very well for a mechanic shop on land, but to plow the stormy ocean, exposed to the range of the powerful guns of enemies, it would seem that the complication, the expense, and the peril are too great to constitute a practical, successful enterprise.

This war steamer as she lies to-day in Portsmouth harbor cost not less than $7,500,000, and to keep her in working trim must cost nearly $500,000 per year while she is in active service. It is very questionable whether the Inflexible will ever kill men enough of an enemy to pay as an investment. The modern naval armament has gone to such a wonderful extreme in mechanism and expense that war, always expensive enough, must now be doubly and trebly so. Just think what England has expended and is expending to keep up her powerful navy and army. Her arsenal at Woolwich has cost hundreds of millions of dollars, and consumes nearly a hundred million per year to keep it running. She has fine dockyards where war steamers are constructed and they are very expensive establishments. She has over a hundred iron war steamers afloat, not all as costly as the Inflexible, of course, but undoubtedly aggregating not a cent less than $300,000,000, with $10,000,000 more per year to keep them in running order. Her land armament, including all the expenses of her war department, costs as much more, a vast sum indeed to throw away for military glory and the title of "Mistress of the Seas." Such expenses have burdened this little island with a terrible load of debt, and have piled up the taxes mountains high upon the backs and shoulders of the poor people, to be perpetuated generation after generation. How much better it would have been for mankind to be governed by the peaceful principles of humanity, treating sister nations in a spirit of justice and amity! I do not wish to see my country follow the example of England in building an expensive navy, and is spending hundreds of millions in preparations for killing human beings. I think it would be far better to announce the principles of right and justice as our rule of action and not bloodshed and murder.

When looking at the Arsenal at Woolwich I was amused at the humorous remarks of one of the workmen, who made sport of the vast sums of money England spends every year in making heavy guns, the most improved shot, her Gatling guns, and all the rest, only to be whipped by a handful of Boers, and her Gatling guns taken from her. If an individual or a nation will be strictly just in their intercourse with others, but little necessity will arise for fighting and bloodshed, and the life of millions will not hav to be ground out of them to get up expensive implements and apparatus for killing their brothers. How much lighter load the people of England would have to carry to-day, how much better off might be her poorer classes, had she not spent the thousands of millions in war that she has, to say nothing of the hundreds of thousand that hav laid down their lives for glory! True, she would have fewer colonies than she has now, her dominions would not extend all around the globe, but it is very probable that her people would be happier.

After looking over the dockyards, seeing what we cared for in the naval way, we rode per tramway (horse-cars) to the Commons at South Sea—a part of Portsmouth. The Commons are a level green of some three hundred acres, without shrubbery and floral decorations, but a fine place for parades or games of ball, and for children to sport and exercise. A road and a walk for pedestrians surround it. It fronts on the water, and is a place of much resort on pleasant evenings. At the southern point is a commodious hall where public meetings are held, particularly those of a reform character. Along the walk are several monuments—some of them quite pretty—erected to commemorate those whom have fallen in battles which English soldiers have fought.

We visited one of the forts, connected with which is a light-house. We climbed up into the light-house and viewed the manner in which lights of various colors are shown to those off at sea. Having looked over the fortification we returned to Mr. Brumage's and partook of dinner, after which Mr. and Mrs. Brumage accompanied me to the station, and I was soon on my way back to London, a distance of seventy-five miles, where I arrived about 9 P.M. I have reason to feel very grateful to Mr. Brumage, and regard him as one of nature's noblemen—one who has not hesitated to speak and act his earnest convictions, though he lost pecuniarily by so doing.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S SUIT.

On Monday, the 19th, I attended, at the criminal court on Bow street, Mr. Bradlaugh's suit against Mr. Charles Newdegate, M. P., and Mr. W. G. Stuart, on a charge of maintenance, for procuring a Mr. Henry Lewis Clark to prosecute Mr. Bradlaugh for voting in the House of Commons without having taken the prescribed oath. As Mr. Bradlaugh was complainant in the case, he could not conduct it himself, but was represented by Mr. George Lewis, who showed that Mr. Bradlaugh was duly elected to Parliament from the borough of Northampton, and that when he took his seat in the house he claimed the right to affirm in place of taking the oath, and that he was permitted by the House to do so. At length Mr. Clark was induced to bring suit against Mr. Bradlaugh for a penalty of £500 for each vote he had cast. It was clear that Mr. Clark would not have brought the suit in the High Court of Justice, and thus put Mr. Bradlaugh to very heavy expense, had he not been prompted to do so by Messrs. Newdegate and Stuart; and that their conduct was a violation of the statute, the first act of Richard II., chap. 4, section 3, and also common law. He claimed that the defendants were amenable for damages.

The case was tried before Magistrate Vaughan. Mr. Clark was called as a witness. He admitted that he had not thought of commencing suit against Mr. Bradlaugh until Mr. Stuart spoke to him about the matter and proposed that the suit be brought. He also admitted that he had not himself furnished any portion of the money to meet the expenses of the suit. Another witness or two was called upon, when Mr. Bradlaugh took the stand as a witness and made affirmation in place of taking an oath and kissing the book, and I must say the affirmation is much more pretty and impressive than the old form of the oath. Mr. Bradlaugh stated that Mr. Newdegate admitted that he furnished £200 to defray the expenses, and signed a bond guaranteeing to meet the entire expenses, and more in the same direction. Mr. Bradlaugh's manner, as he stood in the witness-box, was collected and dignified. His utterances were ready and clear, and in the explanations he had to to make he was very lucid. His style, altogether, is pleasing and winning.

Mr. Edward Clarke, Q. C., M. P., appeared for Mr. Newdegate and insisted that the case was not such a one as the act premeditated, and that Mr. Newdegate had committed no violation. He spoke at considerable length, and quoted authorities. Mr. Poland appeared for Mr. Stuart and took a similar line of argument, and also claimed that Mr. Bradlaugh had himself received money from his friends to conduct his side of the contest. Mr. Kydd also appeared for the defendants, but did not make a speech. He has retrograded from the position he once occupied. Many years ago he was a radical, and probably many in America will remember him as a Chartist. He now, however, is working with the Conservatives, finding it, perhaps, more respectable.

The magistrate, who, by the bye, is a very good Christian, could easily see that Messrs. Newdegate & Stuart had not violated the statute, or that the act did not apply to this case, and as no convictions had taken place under the act it would not be right for the defendants to be convicted under it. He also took the position that if Mr. Bradlaugh had been injured his redress was at common law. He discharged the defendants.

This is perhaps a very fair instance of Christian justice. The defendants had already violated the act by inducing Clark to bring on a suit against Mr. Bradlaugh for the purpose of subjecting him to heavy expenses, but he deemed it not necessary to inflict a penalty upon the defendants. He seemed to make considerable of the fact that though the act was an old one no convictions under it had been secured, as though that made any difference with the nature of an act. A law is just as sacred before a conviction has been secured under it as after thousands have been secured. Besides, it was not shown that no convictions had been secured under the act. It has been many times proved that magistrates can see very plausible reasons for deciding with their inclinations. Mr. Vaughan clearly was prejudiced against Mr. Bradlaugh and on the side of the pious Mr. Newdegate. It is likely that Mr. Bradlaugh will not let the matter rest here, and that he will bring an action in another form. But when an Atheist brings a suit against a Christian, and in a Christian court, he cannot expect to receive impartial justice.

I wish right here to make a correction of the error which many Americans have fallen into relative to Mr. Bradlaugh refusing to take the oath in the House of Commons. It is not strange that this erroneous opinion should have been adopted in our country, for papers in this country, notably the Times and the Pall Mall Gazette, published the false statement that Mr. Bradlaugh did not refuse to take the oath, but simply claimed the right to affirm, which right was granted him. Had he been refused his seat contingent upon his not taking the oath he would assuredly have taken it, as he would now if he cannot take his seat otherwise. He prefers affirmation, but if nothing but taking the oath will answer, he will take it and depend upon as early as possible introducing a bill legalizing affirmation when the oath is conscientiously objected to. The course of Mr. Bradlaugh has been consistent through all this struggle, though he has enemies who would gladly misrepresent him and make him appear inconsistent.

In the evening I accepted an invitation to dinner at Mrs. Besant's, in the West End, at which Mr. Bradlaugh and his two daughters were present. I felt honored by being in such company, and the evening was a most enjoyable one.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

On the morning of the 20th inst. the sad intelligence of President Garfield's death was received by cable in this city, and a feeling of gloom seemed spread over this country similar to what must exist on the other side of the Atlantic. It is indeed a sad blow that a President should be so needlessly and wrongfully smitten down by an evil-minded person; and that after the patient had for two months and a half so vigorously withstood the effects of the fatal bullet he should have to succumb at last. In connection with this case it is to be remarked that there has been a great loss of labor in the way of prayer. Not only all the Christians of America, but of all Christendom, have been making extraordinarily earnest prayers that the Lord would be so condescending as to let President Garfield get well. Even the Methodist Ecumenical Council, if that is the proper name for it, consisting of black clergymen and bishops, as well as white, which has been sitting in this city for two weeks, laid aside their regular business long enough to make stated and most earnest prayers for the recovery of Gen. Garfield. Millions of prayers have been offered up to the supposed beneficent ruler of the world for this express purpose. We are often told of some very astonishing cures effected by the prayer of some old woman or other pious devotee, but they are generally obscure cases that nobody knew anything about, or they were instances when the mind might have had a great deal to do with effecting a cure, and when the force of the will stimulated the sickly one to so act as to be restored to health. In the case of President Garfield, however, an excellent opportunity was presented to prove what united and sincere prayer can do. Here was an absolute ailment, a ball had certainly been sent into his body, from the evil effects of which the Lord surely ought to be able to relieve him, if he can do anything in that line.

Here also was an instance where a motive should have moved him to make a slight effort in the curative line. The injured man had a good healthy constitution, his services were greatly needed by his country, and millions of hearts were beseeching him day and night to be good enough to let this man get well. There never was a better chance for divine Providence to distinguish himself, to show his power, and to let the world see what the united prayers of the Christian host can accomplish. But no; he would not so much as lift his little finger that Garfield might live. He was unwilling to do anything in response to the supplications offered up. He let the man die precisely as he would have died had not a prayer been raised. He has clearly proved that the greatest number of prayers ever before offered him upon a definite subject hav been totally unheeded, unanswered, and useless. Not for the whole Christian world, and to oblige their heartfelt, earnest, and long-continued entreaties, would he do the first thing to cure that man; he would not make the first motion toward answering all those prayers, and the whole world is left to conclude that after all the claims and boastings that have been made about the great utility of prayer—that all we have to do when we have a favor to ask is just to go to God and lay our trouble before him, just request him to listen to our prayers, and he will kindly do what we ask of him—is all false; that there is nothing in all these assurances; for here is a case just in point; a good man had been shot, the ball had done a fatal injury, and all that was necessary was divine power to obviate the difficulty. To invoke the divine power hundreds of millions of subdued hearts, who believe that God will show his power when they ask him, have called upon this God sincerely, earnestly, and persistently, and it has all had not the slightest effect. God would not, or could not, cure Garfield. And after this, when prayer is held up to us as such a powerful lever to act upon the distinguished personage who dwells above the clouds, many people will inquire mentally, if not otherwise, "Why did not God cure Garfield?"

But now Christians will turn and tell us that God did not deem it best to cure the smitten man; that in his inscrutable wisdom he wished him to die; that his divine providence governs all the affairs of the world, and that nothing is done save by his will, permission, and procuring; that he has his hidden purpose to carry out, and that he will not be swerved from it. This style of argument, however, places their God in a very unpleasant position. It not only makes him responsible for Garfield's death, but also guilty of the shooting. If God wished all this to take place as it has done, it was he who incited Guiteau to aim that deadly pistol, and consequently is more at fault thau Guiteau himself, and should be hung in place of him. If he did not want Guiteau to perform that rash deed, why did he permit him to do it? He certainly must hav known, if he knows all things, what the effect of that shot would be; that Garfield would lie in a condition of suffering for eleven weeks; that he (God) would be called upon by his most faithful followers and devoted advocates hundreds of millions of times to undo the fatal work of that bullet, that he would not or could not do it, and that the sinful world would be left to decide that there is no efficacy in prayer. If he knew all this, why did he suffer it to take place, unless he wanted the foul deed done just as it was done? If he wanted Garfield out of the way, or needed him in his heavenly realm above, it would, at least, have been better to kill him with a fever rather than suffer such a vile wretch as Guiteau to shoot him down like a dog. The ways of Providence indeed are inscrutable, and if his apologists speak truly, he is guilty of a deed that the worst man living would blush to be caught at.

Such is Christian logic. If Garfield had recovered they would triumphantly exclaim, "See what prayer has done!" "It was we who did it." But now that he has died they say, "God knows best." "His inscrutable purposes must be carried out." Thus it is tweedledum or tweedledee, and that is all that can be made of it.

Causes will continue to produce effects, and not all the gods which men have devised can prevent it. Natural results will still be the product of natural causes. There is no mysterious and fickle ruler of the universe who is swayed around and influenced, by the prayers and supplications of short-sighted, ignorant human beings, to change his plans and purposes, and the quicker men become apprised of this truth the better will it be for them, and they can learn to spend their time more profitably than in offering up to an imaginary being prayers which can have no effect.

The praying Christians, now that Garfield is dead, will be left to conclude that one of three conclusions is the true one: 1st, That God wished Garfield to die, and took the means to effect his death; or, 2nd, That he wished to cure Garfield but found himself unable to do it, as on another occasion he found himself unable to drive out inhabitants of a certain valley in the land of Canaan, "because they had chariots of iron" (See Judges i, 19), or, 3d, That God does not trouble himself about the affairs of this world and leaves natural laws to act in all cases, that the world is not governed by prayer, and that the best thing men can do is to make themselves as thoroughly acquainted with the laws of the universe as possible, and to live in obedience to them, and that this will be far better than looking to or depending upon merciless gods.

The assurance is left us that though our President has died, the Vice-President steps to the head of our government, public affairs will continue to move along as smoothly as before, and that the American people will soon become reconciled to the changed state of things.

Trusting this may be so, I bid you good-bye for the present. I hold you daily in remembrance.

More from London.

LONDON, Sept. 22, 1881.

DEAR READERS: Among the many places I have visited in this mammoth city I will mention the graves of Daniel De Foe, the author of "Robinson Crusoe," John Bunyan, the author of the "Pilgrim's Progress," John Wesley, the author of Methodism, Susannah Wesley, the author, or rather mother, of John Wesley, besides numerous others of the noted Dissenters of a hundred years ago. These men, who made a noise in the world, and wrote that which has been read by millions of their fellow-beings, who were unborn when they died, are now quietly resting in the burying-ground belonging to the Wesleyan chapel, on City Road, in the eastern portion of the city, where the Methodists of Europe and America recently held their twelve-days' conference, congress, or council. They all have appropriate monuments over the places where they repose. Bunyan has his image in marble, lying face upward, ready to catch the first sound when Gabriel blows his sonorous trumpet to waken those who have been sleeping for centuries, and on the side of the tomb is the pilgrim Christian making his celebrated journey from the land of sin to the beautiful land of Beulah, with his heavy pack of sin not fallen off his back. Bunyan was a remarkable man for his time, and the rich conceptions of his allegories prove him a man of unusual mental resources. His style is a trifle antiquated for our times, but great numbers will continue to read his "Pilgrim's Progress," than which no work written in the interest of Christianity has had a more extensive reading.

Wesley was also a great man, and led one of the most active lives on record. I forget the number of thousand sermons he delivered, the number of books he wrote, and the number of hymns he composed, but they are great. There is no question but what both Bunyan and Wesley were honest and sincere men, and toiled to perform what they believed to be for the benefit of their fellow-beings. But as for real good performed, De Foe was certainly not behind either Bunyan or Wesley. His charming stories have given innocent pleasure to many millions of young people, and he did not write to sustain an erroneous system of falsehoods and fables. Though his hero, Robinson Crusoe, was in part a mythical character, the pleasing narrative has assisted in molding the character of thousands upon thousands of boys, who have received no bad influences from the pleasing tale. Wesley lies in the rear of the chapel, while the others are in the old cemetery across the street. They are surrounded by great numbers of the men who dared to dissent from the Established church, and who more or less distinguished themselves while they lived. Among them may be mentioned Isaac Watts, of pious hymn memory; Thomas Goodwin, D.D., Cromwell's minister; John Owen, D.D.; Nathaniel Lardner, D.D., and other D.D.'s. They figured actively in the affairs of their times, and did all they could to establish the kingdom of Jesus on earth. If they were mistaken, they were honestly so, like millions of others who have come and gone since they passed off the stage.

I visited the portion of the city called Smithfield, where John Rogers, John Bradford, John Philpot, and many others were burnt at the stake in the supposed interest of this same Christian system, which has executed millions for not believing just as they ought to, and which has caused the death of fifty millions more by wars and persecutions. It might be borne in mind that as bad as the pagan religions of the world have been, they have not all taken half as many lives for opinion's sake as has Christianity, which has been misnamed the religion of love. It would be far more felicitous to call it the religion of hate. The incidents with regard to John Rogers, it will be remembered, were peculiarly touching. He left a wife and nine children, "the youngest of which was at the breast." A tablet of stone, duly inscribed, indicates the spot where the burning was done.

Very near the same locality is the oldest church in London—the church of Saint Bartholomew the Great. Of course I had to visit it and look at the old altar, the baptismal font, and the numerous tombs of many of the distinguished Christians who have died here within the past six centuries. The church was commenced in 1102, under the Catholic regime, and was twenty years in being completed. It was built for an abbey and was made extensive. It is in the Norman style of architecture, the inner columns are massive, and the whole looks quite well, considering its age. A part of it has been torn down and replaced by a hospital, which, it is to be hoped, is quite as useful to humanity as are the cloisters for monks.

A square or two away stands the old Bailey prison, made famous in history, where hundreds of unfortunate wretches have been imprisoned for their crimes or their misfortunes. The private door was shown me where the criminals were brought out for execution in the street before the prison. Probably hundreds have been executed on the spot pointed out. This private door was opened only for prisoners to pass out to be executed. A shudder of horror passes over one while looking at it. In fact I can hardly look at a prison without being reminded of past experience, and realizing how much injustice has been measured out to men who were unable to think as their masters commanded. It is not probable that one-tenth of the wretchedness and oppression thus caused has ever been recorded.

I have many times passed St. Paul's Cathedral, and once stepped in when religious services were being performed, a procedure that occurs every day and on many days twice. One cannot help noticing the great similarity between the services performed here and those held at Catholic cathedrals and churches. The same paraphernalia is used, the same pulpit stands out by itself; the choir are dressed in the same white night-shirts, and chant in the same manner; the alto and soprano are sung by boys, no female singer being allowed; and a similar style of ritual also is employed. One is probably as worthy as the other, and neither of them of any money value, unless the money is valueless or extremely plentiful. I must say the choir of boy singers acquitted themselves extremely well, easily reaching the highest notes, and singing very clear, strong, and beautiful. No company of ladies singing equally as well would need to feel that they had not reached a high degree of musical perfection. The church understands the power of harmonious blending of sounds, and has employed music, both vocal and instrumental, to induce the masses to attend its places of worship. So far as music and the social qualities are concerned, the churches are good. The trouble is they hold up fallacies and errors and demand that the people shall accept them as truths.

I have attended several meetings at the Hall of Science, on Old street, the principal place where the Freethinkers of the city attend Freethought and scientific lectures. I first attended a lecture of Dr. E. B. Aveling on the "Martyrs of Science," as I mentioned before, and a very able discourse it was. On the second Sunday I listened to Mr. G. W. Foote on the subject of "Poverty, Priestcraft, and Privilege." He is about thirty-five years of age and possesses a very large amount of talent. His arguments were good, his style pleasant, and his matter excellent. He indulges in a little humor now and then, which gives spice to his remarks. He is regularly in the Freethought lecture field, traveling and speaking in all parts of the kingdom, and is performing an excellent work.

On the third Sunday I listened to Mr. Joseph Symes on the subject, "Is it Possible to be a Real Christian?" and he effectually showed that it is not. He is a forcible speaker, who uses argument, logic, and humor with equal readiness. He keeps his audiences in a very pleasant mood by his frequent sallies of humor and sarcasm. He is popular in this country, and I ventured to assure him, should he decide to visit America at any time he would meet with a kind reception. He is also pretty constantly in the lecture field, and is a zealous and effective laborer. I think he is nearly forty. He also has charge of a school in Birmingham—his home—in which he takes great pride.

On the Sunday following I listened again to Dr. Aveling, his subject being "Some of the Blunders of Nature." He showed conclusively that, however perfect the designer of the universe is supposed to be, vegetable and animal nature shows many mistakes which an all-wise, all-powerful being should not be guilty of. Dr. Aveling is a profound scientist, having taken the degree of doctor of science in the London University, where the course of examination is so thorough and the demands so exacting that none but those who have made their study of the closest character can pass. But few are able to take the degree. He is said to be the youngest doctor of science in the kingdom. I think he is a little past thirty. His avowed Freethought convictions prevent his acceptance by the Christian public and keep him from holding desirable positions in institutions of learning. He was demonstrator of anatomy in one of the colleges of the city, but his advocacy of Freethought lost him the position. He is equally familiar with geology, chemistry, mathematics, biology, botany, zoology, anatomy, and physiology, and has private and public classes in each. He also finds time to do considerable lecturing on scientific and Freethought subjects in various parts of the kingdom. He works harmoniously with Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, and the three are often spoken of as "the trinity." He is assuredly one of the bright lights of the future.

On Thursday evening, Sept. 15th, I heard Mrs. Besant give the initiatory lecture of a series of scientific discourses to be delivered, one each week, through the fall and winter. Mrs. Besant delivers the first four on the "Physiology of Home," Miss Hypatia Bradlaugh gives four on "Elementary Chemistry," to which science she has been fondly devoted for two years or more; Dr. Aveling follows with four lectures on the "Plays of Shakspere," after which Mr. Bradlaugh will deliver four lectures on "Anthropology," to be succeeded undoubtedly by others. Mrs. Besant treated the subject of physiology in a very clear and able manner, showing particularly in her first lecture what are the functions of the stomach, the composition and constituent parts of food; which foods make muscle, which give warmth, which increase fat, which sustain mental vigor and feed the brain, which are the most easy of digestion, and which least beneficial to the human organism. I must repeat what I have said before, that Mrs. Besant is a very remarkable woman. She lectures in the ablest manner upon theological subjects, Freethought topics, political questions, and scientific matters with equal facility and ability, and without notes. She readily and coolly answers all queries and objections that may be raised by persons in her audience. She seems to understand all questions, and to be able to handle them with almost unexampled ability. In addition, I will say she is master of the German and French languages. In her discussion last winter with the Rev. Mr. Hatchard, who considers himself one of the ablest advocates of Christianity, she utterly defeated him, and showed not only that the claims of Christianity are entirely false, but that she is decidedly an abler debater and speaker than the reverend gentleman. When he forgot himself and flew in a passion at his discomfiture, she remained throughout perfectly cool and self-possessed. The wife of a prominent clergyman, she assisted him in the preparation of his sermons and other theological writings, in which occupation she was led to see the defects in Christian arguments and proofs; and finding that the system is not what is claimed for it, she studied the subject thoroughly, reading all the works for and against Christian evidence that came within her reach, the result of which was she became a decided unbeliever. When her mind became settled upon the question she frankly told her reverend husband that she could no longer believe or sustain Christian claims and theories. This, of course, produced a rupture; he was too much of a Christian to allow her freedom of opinion, and it was not long before he drew up papers of separation, by the terms of which he retained the son and she was accorded the possession of the daughter. It will be remembered, however, that he subsequently brought suit for the daughter, and a bigoted, unjust judge gave him the possession of the child on the ground that the mother, being an Atheist, was no longer a fit person to attend to the tuition of her child, and she was denied the natural rights of maturnity. A greater injustice was never committed.

After her separation from her husband she removed to London and maintained herself by writing on subjects of a Freethought character for publication. She ultimately became acquainted with Mr. Bradlaugh, and they became fast friends and coworkers. They also entered into copartnership in the publishing business, including the National Reformer, which has a large circulation, and many Freethought and scientific books and pamphlets, for which there is an active demand. In addition to her other duties she travels over the kingdom filling lecture engagements upon anti-theological and political reform subjects. On the evening of Monday, the 19th, she was advertised to deliver a lecture at one of the northern towns of England, her subject being Mr. Bradlaugh and his rights. It seems a bigoted Conservative lawyer had hired some thirty evilly disposed persons to take seats among her audience and so interrupt her that she could not deliver the lecture. This plan was meanly attempted to be carried out. When she began speaking they began calling out and making vile noises, which prevented her from being heard. She kept cool, and still tried to go on with the lecture, but the noise and uproar were so kept up that she could not be heard. After patiently waiting three-fourths of an hour, and seeing no prospect of the blackguards acting like gentlemen, she gave word to her friends, who were present in large numbers, to expel the ruffians. No sooner was the word given than it was acted upon. In a very few moments the thirty ill-mannered disturbers, including the lawyer who hired them, were forcibly ejected from the room, and Mrs. Besant gave her lecture in peace; after which she rode twelve miles in a carriage across country, and took the train and rode most of the night in reaching London. On the evening of the same day I took dinner at her house, and when I arrived there I found her busy with her writing and correspondence. She is indeed an indefatigable worker. In addition to all else she has to do she is closely studying seven distinct sciences (those before named), and has already passed a first-class examination in some of them, and expects next year to take the distinguished degree of Bachelor of Science. Where is there another woman doing as much? Where is there another who possesses such diversity of talent and such marked ability? I am sure I do not know.

I am pleased to be able to state that the meetings at the Hall of Science are very fully attended, and the audiences appear to be intelligent and enthusiastic people, a fair proportion of whom are ladies. A small admission fee is taken, and the amounts so received pay the expenses of the hall and leave a fair sum for the speakers. In addition to the meetings at this hall out-door meetings of a Freethought character are held in nine places in this city, to which purpose several speakers in the city devote their services. Prominent among these is my friend Mr. Forder, the secretary of the National Secular Society. I have to say for the Secular Society in England that it is thoroughly organized, it is much interested in the promulgation of Freethought sentiments, and its members are ready to do all in their power to combat the encroachments of priestcraft and bigotry. For the establishment and continuance of such an organization too much praise cannot be awarded to the energy and untiring industry of Mr. Bradlaugh. For a disposition to work, for strong personal magnetism, and for executive ability, I am sure Mr. Bradlaugh has no superior.

I have twice visited the house at No. 6 Ropemaker street, the house which Thomas Paine lived in while in London at the time he came over to England after the American Revolution, and the house where he wrote the "Rights of Man." It will be remembered that Paine, when he came to England, had in view the introduction and manufacture of the iron bridge which he had invented. An iron manufacturer in Sunderland undertook the manufacture of the bridge, and Mr. Paine was to furnish the drawings and specifications. In a discussion which was not long ago held in one of the British reviews as to who was the first inventor of the iron bridge it was finally proved that it was Thomas Paine, and a letter from him to the manufacturer dated from No. 6 Ropemaker street was printed, in which Paine said he was engaged in writing a book, the "Rights of Man," which was nearly completed, and as soon as it was done he would attend to the bridge. This promise he carried out. The bridge was built, and, if I am not mistaken, is standing to this day. Thus the first iron bridge to carry people safely over turbulent streams and a great political work well-calculated to convey people over the stream of kingcraft and despotism were the results of the same brain, and their conception not far from the same time. I have also seen at Mr. Truelove's the identical table on which Paine wrote the "Rights of Man." I will say an additional word of the house at No. 6 Ropemaker street—that it is an antique looking house, of dark stone, three stories high; it looks to be at least a century old. At the time Paine occupied it it was at the border of the city, which now extends miles beyond it.

SOME QUEER PLACES.

In a city as large as this there must be of course localities and peoples very unlike those of other portions. In the West End are the finest residences and the pleasantest streets. A large share of the buildings are on lots large enough to allow the houses to stand some distance apart, which are called villas. The lots are uniformly profusely decorated with shrubbery and flowers, which do remarkably well in this cool, humid climate. They grow more slowly than with us, but they seem to grow stockier and remain a greater length of time in the stage of beauty. In the eastern part of the city the poorer people liv, and of course they are more huddled together, the streets are narrower, the houses poorer, with no shrubbery, and very few flowers to be seen. On Sunday morning I made a visit to the Jew quarter in the vicinity of Petticoat Lane, east of Bishopsgate street. Here, covering an area of half a mile across, probably reside twenty thousand of the sons of Abraham, who tread the humble walks of life. There are said to be one hundred thousand Jews in London, and among them are some of the wealthiest merchants and bankers in this city, some of the best artists, some of the best musicians, some of the best writers, some of the best actors and actresses; but these are not the class of Hebrews who live in Petticoat Lane. As soon as I was in its precincts I had not the slightest doubt about my being in the Jewish quarter. The physiognomy of the denizens would adequately remove all doubts on this score did any exist. The stands and tables in the middle of the streets are laden with old clothes, second-hand shoes, articles of women's apparel, second-hand merchandise of various kinds, fruits and vegetables hastening to a state of decay, old books, old hardware, old pictures, old odds and ends, and much else too numerous to catalogue, with the anxious faces of those who were very desirous to effect sales. Sunday morning, as it was, clearly told me that I was amidst a Jewish population. Great efforts were being made to sell the multitudinous ware so freely placed upon the market, for really it was a market day. The narrow streets were densely crowded with both Jews and gentiles, the former out to buy their usual supplies, and the latter drawn there to obtain cheap bargains, for it is universally known that the Jews will sell cheaper than anybody else.

These merchandise stands and long tables were continued in many streets and crowded together about as closely as possible. All were crying out the merits of their wares and emphasizing the extremely low prices at which they were disposing of their valuable goods. Some forty persons within hearing all crying out like industrious auctioneers is calculated to make some din on a quiet Sunday morning, when the pious Christians are wending their way to church so devout that it seems almost a sin to raise their eyes. The narrow streets in Jewry were so crowded with men, women, and children that it was almost impossible to squeeze one's self through the dense throng, and thus one was almost compelled to listen to the earnest cries of auctioneers, males and females, the shrill voices of the latter not at all drowned by the heavier bass voices of the coarser part of humanity. It mattered not whether it was old petticoats, gowns, underwear, nuts, cabbages, squashes, potatoes, geese, miscellaneous toys and notions, old files, gimlets, corkscrews, ladles, frying-pans, tea-cups, plates, pitchers, chambers, knives and forks, linens, muslins, calicoes, flannels, old and new shoes, old hats, ribbons, photographs, engravings, jewelry, old books, apples, pears, plums, bread, cakes, small beer, lemonade, fresh fried fish, or fresh baked potatoes, baked on the streets, they were all cried out lustily by the numerous venders and sold at remarkably low prices. Apples, pears, and plums at a penny a pound to the ha'pence; ginger beer and lemonade a penny a bottle; photographs a penny apiece; old books from thrippence to a shilling and eighteen pence; second-hand garments from a shilling to four shillings, and so on. Among the Jews every young man and woman is a natural merchant, and they had far rather sell cheap than not to sell at all.

I edged my way through a narrow passage crowded with human beings into a large emporium or temple or barn of second-hand clothing. Here pants, coats, and vests are well brushed up, the dresses and petticoats well smoothed out and made as attractive as possible. It was a novelty to see such a mass of clothing, the greater part of which seemed to be second hand, in one establishment, and so much system in the arrangement of it. But the streets, clustered as they were with merchandise and human beings, were the greatest points of attraction. Many of these were so crowded as to make ingress and egress alike difficult. The purchasers and perambulators were only partly Jewish. Many outsiders seem to go there to buy cheap bargains and to see what is to be seen in those quarters. I made a slight purchase—a dozen photographs and three second-hand books. I noticed a sharp, shrewd Jew who had a table of very poor trash, and pretended to be selling contraband stuff, such as Comstock keeps in his possession to show to clergymen, but is unwilling others should exercise the same right. He had an illustrated copy or two of Aristotle's works, which I saw no one buy, but his principal business was selling transparent playing cards, which were supposed to be very naughty things, at a penny apiece. He acted very fearful that the police would see him, and pretended to withdraw his goods when any policemen were near. As a matter of course his transparent cards went off very lively, but I was told that the purchasers were disappointed in not finding the kind of pictures they wished; the cards were as innocent as kindergarten pictures. Thus that Jew was raking in a lively shower of pennies by pretending to be doing worse than he was.

I looked into the dwellings all along the Jewish streets to see what sort of places the people lived in, but I saw very few neat, cozy-looking houses; nearly all were dirty, ill-kept, unenticing places. The streets were untidy also, and seemed to be littered with straw and dirt of various kinds. As it soon began to sprinkle, the streets were not at all improved by it, and not finding the place congenial, I turned my face toward the habitations of the gentiles. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

A New England Freethinkers' Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hope the day is not far distant when the Liberal men and women of New England will be called together at Paine Memorial, in Boston, and organize a New England Freethinkers' meeting. Such an organization, with a good president, and a number of vice-presidents and other officers, meeting once or twice a year in Boston at Paine Hall, and spending three or four days in promulgating the cause of free speech, free thought, and free press, would shake the old sham Christianity of New England to its very center. I believe that such an organization would call thousands of noble men together and they would achieve victories in the cause of free speech that would liv in song forever. I am heart and hand with Bro. Bennett and all Liberals engaged in the overthrow of Christianity, the sham Christianity that has cursed millions of the human family, and has caused blood and tears enough to be shed to float all the navies of the world.

Ever looking and contending for the truth, I remain, Yours, etc., T. A. LAMB, M. D.

THE discussion of "The Christian Religion," by Colonel Ingersoll and Judge Black, which was commenced in the August number of the North American Review, is continued in the November issue of that publication. Col. Ingersoll now replies to the strictures of his opponent, and presents much more fully than he has ever before done the logical grounds for his opposition to Christianity. The article will be received with interest by those who hav read the first part of the debate, as well as by all those who believe that the cause of truth is best advanced by free discussion. An early number of the Review will contain an exhaustiv reply. In a Symposium on Presidential Inability, four of our most eminent jurists, Judge Thomas M. Cooley, the Hon. Lyman Trumbull, Prof. Theodore M. Dwight, and General B. F. Butler, discuss the several weighty problems arising out of Article Two of the Constitution. "England's Hereditary Republic" is the title of a significant paper contributed by the Marquis of Blandford, and Senator George F. Hoar writes a statesmanlike article on "The Appointing Power" of the President of the United States.

WE hav plenty more of those colored posters on hand which we will gladly send to any friend who takes enough interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER to aid in extending its circulation.

Lecture Notes.

We wanderers, preaching the Infidel gospel, find ourselves now in the East, now in the West. We seem to be the plaything of fate; for, no matter what we may propose, a certain inscrutable combination of what we call circumstances disposes of us very unceremoniously. It was my intention to hav labored somewhat longer in the East, but the West beckoned and I responded. The journey thither was seasoned well with the labor, losses, gains, trials, and successes of the average itinerant Freethinker.

After the long-to-be-remembered and much-enjoyed Hornellsville Convention, we took a week of rest, spiced with two evening's labor, at the home of H. C. Chase, of Belvidere, N. Y. The town is a mere station, and our friend Chase is proprietor of the hotel, and if any Liberals should at any time find themselvs in that vicinity they will do well to go somewhat out of their line of travel to be entertained by the genial host and his handsome and hospitable wife. They are interested in making one spot of earth happy and habitable, and they succeed. There are other Liberals scattered about in the town proper and Belmont and Friendship near by. I spoke at the latter place, but the thought seemed to be new and a little indigestible. They should hav a number of lectures in that vicinity by some live Liberal speaker. Several of the Spiritualistic lecturers hav spoken at Friendship, but it has not served to arouse the people to a realization of the necessity of secularizing the state. Bidding the Belvidere friends a reluctant good-bye, we continued on our course, stopping for a night and day with H. L. Green at Salamanca. It seemed to us, after entering his pleasant home, and seeing to what a rare degree Mrs. Green possesses the faculty of making home attractiv and everybody happy, that it must be a serious trial for Mr Green to encounter the rough and tumble of missionary life. But he seems to bear it well, and, indeed, actually to covet the heat of battle rather than to remain safely in the rear. With so much to be done, certainly none of our workers should be left spoiling for the fight.

Next, westward to Cleveland, where we arrived in a drenching rain and were taken in and cared for right royally by that noble woman and true humanitarian, Grace L. Parkhurst. I had formed the acquaintance of Mrs. Parkhurst through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but as there is an old saying that "distance lends enchantment to the view," I was not entirely prepared to perceive at close range one so ideally real as a humanitarian and Liberal. The fact that here and there, now and then we find caged in a human form the soul of an angel helps incalculably to keep us afloat on the rough tide of life.

Leaving Cleveland, we hastened on to Angola, Ind., to fill an appointment with the League there. Arrived in the evening, travel-worn and sick, but to be so well taken care of at the delightful home of Mr. A. W. Hendry of that place that the morning sun found me ready for my work.

The League here means business, and it is capable of carrying it on. Each lecture was attended by a large audience, and twenty new members were added to the list as a result of my labors. Much credit is due my able co-laborers, W. F. Jamieson and J. H. Burnham, for setting in motion the present Liberal "boom" of Angola; also to the efficient Secretary, H. Freygang, for his activity and the fine music furnished by an orchestra of seven pieces under his leadership. "Music hath charms;" bear that in mind, my Liberal friends. Other energetic workers, like Thomas Tasker and G. B. Fleming, are fully alive to the needs of the hour, and furnish a good example to the lukewarm Liberals of other towns. The last evening but one of my stay among these friends was devoted to an entertainment, musical and dramatic, given by Mr. Peck and myself, assisted by Freygang's fine orchestra, for the benefit of the Michigan sufferers. The Infidels turned out in large numbers, but our friends of Jesus thought best to remain away lest a little of their money might find its way through heretical fingers into the great suffering world. There is nothing like having benevolence run through a spick-span, orthodox, cast iron, creed-bound channel, you know. But notwithstanding all this, we are enabled to send a modest little sum, in the name of the Angola League, to our suffering fellows, and I really believe it will buy just as warm blankets and just as sound wheat as though the money had been donated by the believers in God and hell-fire. But then that is a mere opinion. Some people might differ with me.

From Angola we went to Camden, Mich., to speak under the auspices of an energetic Infidel, H. N. Prouty. But the Lord had been there before me, and through his agents, the Adventists, had refused me a hall. So, making a virtue of necessity, we congregated the first night in the back part of a shoe shop, hastily improvised for a hall; the second night in a carriage shop, which was fitted up during the day, making a very comfortable place in which to speak. On each occasion the crowd could not even find standing room, and the result was the organization of a League numbering thirty members, who mean work. One of their number, Mr. J. C. Bradley, proposed to donate a fine lot upon which to build a Liberal hall. So, if the signs of the times mean anything, bigotry is doomed in Camden.

From this place we retraced our steps to Waterloo, Ind., where I held two grove meetings on Sunday. That good Liberal, E. R. Shoemaker, was the prime mover in the meeting, and we enjoyed the bounteous hospitality of his very beautiful home. Though a farmer, his library is well stocked with Draper, Denton, Tyndall, Haeckel, Huxley, etc., and his family are brought up in the way they should go. I did not succeed in effecting organization in this place, but trust that I planted some seed which may bear fruit for others at some future time. There is a good field there for prolonged endeavor, and I hope some one may make haste to cultivate it.

From Waterloo we came to the Congress, the doings of which were very elegantly described by that wonderful journal, the Chicago Times, under the charming and beautiful title of "Infidel Itch." That Storey is evidently one, the half of which has never been told. At the close of the Congress we came to this place, where I had the pleasure of speaking last evening to a large and intelligent audience. Here I am to remain for two months for Sunday evening meetings. Societies desiring my services for week evenings will address me at Elgin, Ill.

Letter from California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In a conversation a few evenings ago with A. Berenz, a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER and also of the journal which I hav the honor to edit, I learn a few facts which will, I hope, interest some Freethinkers in particular, and all in general. The subject was upon the true duty of Freethinkers to their fellow-men, and the writer held that the true believer in Freethought could do nothing better than to aid his brother man in making a good, honest living, by telling him where work could be procured or investments made to the best advantage.

"That's my doctrin, exactly," said Mr. Berenz, "and if I could find a half dozen Freethinkers, boot and shoe makers, I'd set them at work in my shop to-morrow, and guarantee them from $20 to $35, gold coin, per week, according to their industry and capacity." And he added: "There's room for fully one hundred first-class boot and shoe makers in this city to-day, and I could tell them where to find work at the highest figures. But we want no 'botches!' The market is overstocked with them. We want only first-class workmen, and married men would be preferable. To an industrious married man, a master in his trade as boot and shoe maker, San Francisco is the place."

As THE TRUTH SEEKER is read by a large number of unusually intelligent mechanics and artisans, it seems to me that there might be some shoemakers amongst the latter who would like to know the facts as given. I took pains to get the figures for work by the piece, which are as follows:

Custom boots,	$4.00 to $4.50
Custom gaiters,	4.00
Custom shoes,	4.00
Napoleon hunting or riding boots,	5.50
Double soles or tap (extra),	.50
Patent leather or kid (extra),	.50
Cork or Marseilles (extra),	1.75
Treble soles (extra),	1.00

Mr. Berenz informs me that custom-made work is now all the rage, though formerly there was no demand, owing to the fact that most of our manufactured goods were shipped from the East. He also informs me that his experince as an employer is all in favor of workmen who are of that class who think for themselvs, in a word, in favor of Freethinkers. He assures me that such men hav more stamina and manhood than others, and that if they giv their word that they will bring their work to the shop at such a time he can count on them as sure as fate. They also take a greater interest in the welfare of their employer and in doing the very best work for him. They never get drunk and "can be counted on every time," as Mr. Berenz puts it. Let us hav one hundred good, square, honest boot and shoe makers of the Freethinking persuasion, and let every man take pride in being worthy of the high praise bestowed on his class by Mr. Berenz. Those interested may address A. Berenz, 315 Bush street, San Francisco, Cal.

I think I wrote you that my friend Berenz is one of those stanch and true Jewish-Americans who, as a man and a Freethinker, has gained that reputation which says, "His word is as good as his bond." This is a reputation that every Freethinker should hav. It is the greatest glory that could be conferred upon him.

I know where there are some magnificent farming lands, hunting grounds, and fisheries open for colonies of Freethinkers, and I will be happy to inform readers interested when I hav a moment's leisure. Let us all do what we can to make this earth an "Eden" for man, regardless of his creed or clime.

Camp-Meeting at Liberal, Mo.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav seen no account in THE TRUTH SEEKER of our camp-meeting, held here on September 9th, 10th, and 11th, so I will giv you a brief synopsis of the affair for the benefit of the many readers of the boss of all Liberal papers.

Friday, the 9th, overshadowed us with storm, cloud, and wintry winds, accompanied by a drenching rain, which gave the out-look a rather somber and gloomy appearance. But some of the campers had started the day previous, and so Friday found them at Liberal regardless of the storm. The town people made them as comfortable as possible, and when the storm subsided, as it did Saturday morning, and the rays of the sun warmed up the atmosphere, all began to feel happy and rejoice at the prospects before them. Speaking, singing, reading, etc., now commenced in earnest, and were kept up during the day with vigor and joy. As the shade of evening made its encroachments on the scene the mental exercises gave way to the physical, and Everybody and his wife indulged in the festivities of the dance.

The third day, Sunday, the children of the Liberal Instruction School gave a display of their regular exercises, followed by a lecture by G. H. Walser, subject, "The Clergy." John Anderson, of Kansas, followed next on Spiritualism. A. C. Stone, of Liberal, spoke next on the same subject. F. L. Yale was the next speaker, taking for his discourse Jesus Christ. Many others made short speeches, which were all well received. The speaking was interspersed with music and song, and the much-needed refreshments were in abundance.

The whole concluded with a dramatic entertainment from the Liberal Dramatic Club, entitled, "Out in the Streets." The hall was incapable of holding the throng that came to see young Liberal's first debut upon the theatrical stage. The general verdict was that the play was rendered with professional skill, and all expressed themselvs as highly delighted with the second annual encampment of Barton county Liberals.

There is talk now of organizing a League here, or making this society an auxiliary to the National Liberal League. I am in hopes it will be accomplished in the near future. There is no reason why every Liberal cannot unite for the secularization of church and state, as laid down in Bro. Wright's last call to the National Convention. The commotion caused throughout the nation by one governor who refused to toady to the church shows plainly the actual necessity of such an organization. S. PARIS DAVIS.

Plagiarism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Some time since Mr. W. H. Burr amused himself in THE TRUTH SEEKER by calling me "Don Quixote Coleman, the cultured plagiarist," and recently he has advertised in THE TRUTH SEEKER his pamphlet charging me with plagiarism. This charge is based on the fact that out of some sixty old quotations from and references to other authors in my "Sabbath" tract (Truth Seeker Tract No. 160, price three cents), about a dozen are identical with or similar to those in Mr. Burr's pamphlet; that is, Mr. Burr charges me with copying from his pamphlet a dozen quotations, etc., from other authors. Quotation at second hand is not plagiarism; the word has no such meaning. All writers quote at second hand more or less, and it is never called plagiarism. Mr. Burr admits that he did so in his Sabbath pamphlet, so one of us is no more a plagiarist than the other. Some of the dozen quotations, etc., in question were taken from the original writers; some from other anti-Sabbatical writers, and a small portion from Mr. Burr's pamphlet. To use original ideas or language of Mr. Burr without credit would be plagiarism; but Mr. Burr has not indicated a line in my tract based on original matter in his book. Everything similar in character in his book and mine is found in previous writers. Mr. B. F. Underwood writes that I completely vindicated myself in the Seymour Times, and that Mr. Burr owes me an apology for his false accusations; and various other competent critics hav said the same thing. WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

Presidio of San Francisco, Cal.

DURING the month of October Mr. Bennett may be addressed at Jerusalem, Palestine, care of Cook's Tourists' Agency; during November, at Bombay, India, care same Agency; and during December at Colombo, Ceylon.

J. H. DYCHES is lecturing on the subjects of Rationalism and Spiritualism, and will answer calls from societies. Address him at Taylor, Texas.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO 55.

604. It is a source of regret that, if the Old Testament must be accepted as the revealed word of God, the copies and translations of it have been so defective. The oldest and most noted translation of the Hebrew scriptures is called the Septuagint. It was translated 180 B.C., or, as claimed by some, 280 B.C. It is asserted to have been done at Alexandria, in Egypt, under Ptolemy Philadelphus, by seventy-two learned men, who understood both Hebrew and Greek. This was the principle version said to have been used by the apostles and early Christian Fathers. It is the one from which later translations have been made, and was used in making what is called King James's translation. A tolerably correct idea of its trustworthiness may be gathered from what learned men hav to say of it. The learned Christian writer, Du Pin, spoke in this way of it: "In short, we must confess that there are many differences betwixt the Hebrew text and the version of the Septuagint, which arose from the corruption and confusion that are in the Greek version we now have. It is certain that it hath been revised divers times, and that several authors have taken the liberty to add thereunto—to retrench and to correct divers things." "It is mere superstition to assert, as some authors do, that the Hebrew text we have at present is not corrupted in any place, and that there is no fault nor anything left out, and that we must indispensably follow it at times. This is not only to speak without evidence, and contrary to all probability, but we have every good proof to the contrary. For in the first place there have been differences betwixt the oldest of the Hebrew copies, which the Massorites have observed, by that which they call Keri and Ketil; and putting one of the readings in the text and the other in the margin, we have the different readings of the Jews of the East and the Jews of the West—the Ben Asher and the Ben Napthali." Bellamy, author of "The New Translation of the Bible," in his introduction, stoutly denounces the errors of translation in the Septuagint, and points out numerous errors and discrepancies, among which are the following: In Genesis xv, 11, there is a sentence, "He drove them away," which ought to have been, "He remained with them." In chapter vi, 6, it says, "It grieved him at his heart," but should have been, "He idolized himself at his heart," implying congratulation in place of regret. In chapter xxii, 16, "Thus she was reproved," should have been rendered, "Thus she was justified." In Jeremiah xx, 7, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived," should be, "O Lord, thou hast persuaded me, and thus was I persuaded." It must be confessed that these discrepancies are serious. Bellamy declares that "the authors of the Septuagint did not critically understand the Hebrew language." Bishop Usher, of vast biblical attainments, is still more severe. He affirms that the Septuagint is not only replete with errors, but that at best it is only a spurious copy, and that the real Septuagint was never circulated, being lost in the destruction of the Alexandrian library, where it was deposited. He says: "The Septuagint translation continually adds to, takes from, and changes the Hebrew text at pleasure. The original translation of it was lost long ago, and what has ever since gone by that name is a spurious copy, abounding in omissions, additions, and alterations of the Hebrew text."

Of the Latin version, taken from the Septuagint, the Christian Father, St. Jerome, said, "If they say the Latin copies are to be credited, let them tell me which, for there are almost as many different copies as there are manuscripts; and if the truth is searched for among so many, why should we not have recourse to the Greek original in order to correct the faults that have proceeded either from the bad translations of the interpreters or from unreasonable corrections that have been made by unskilful critics and alterations that have happened through the carelessness of the copiers?"

The same Father, St. Jerome, stated that Origen, the famous Christian Father and opponent of the Infidel Celsus, wrote a version of the Old Testament, from which many of our modern copies have been taken. Jerome declared that in this translation Origen altered the Greek text most abominably. In reference to this very matter Du Pin gives these words: "St. Jerome makes frequent mention of the additions, corrections, and subtractions made in the version of the Septuagint by Origen, and of the bars and asterisks he made use of for that purpose. 'When Origen,' says Jerome, 'saw there was less in the Greek than the Hebrew, he did not supply it from the version of Theodotian, and put an asterisk or star to it to signify that it was to illustrate what was obscure.'"

St. Jerome gives the information that this same Theodotian was an Infidel, and that his version was confounded with the Septuagint. Du Pin says: "By the carelessness of the transcribers and sometimes by those who set them to work, the asterisks of Origen being misunderstood or left entirely out, in some places the additions of Theodotian were confounded with the version of the Septuagint, which moved Jerome to say that Origen had corrupted and confounded the Septuagint."

It would seem by this that what is regarded as God's word and the additions of the Infidel Theodotian had become inextricably mixed together. A sad medley indeed for Christians to believe or suffer eternal torture!

Curwin, in his published journal (London), gives a rather ludicrous account of what fell under his observation. He says: "I saw in the British Museum the first Bible printed in vellum, and turning to to the ninety-first Psalm, sixth verse, instead of 'thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night,' etc., I saw the following: 'Thou shalt not fear the bugs and vermin by night.'" When it is remembered that at the very best our version of the Jewish scriptures is simply a copy of a copy of a copy, and that the oldest copy in existence is but nine hundred years old, the slight value that should be placed upon its correctness must be apparent. What is eagerly hailed by thousands as the infallible and incorruptible word of God is found to have been changed, altered, added to, abstracted from, until it can hardly be told which was the original and which is the addition It is not at all sure that Deity himself, should he take the trouble to look at it, would be able to tell which were his own words and which the changes and additions. Even if it was divine at first it is greatly to be feared that the changes have been so numerous that it would now be about the hardest thing imaginable for Deity himself to say which parts are genuine and which are not. How sad to contemplate the quarrels and contentions that have raged over this heterogeneous compilation! How great the differences of opinion that have arisen in reference to the reading of the unknown writers! What anger and bickerings have arisen in reference to it! How greatly have people been misled as to the origin and importance of what the book contains! In view of the bitterness, the quarrels, the contentions that have arisen in reference to the hidden meaning of the word, I cannot believe that it has proved a great blessing to the world, or that the loss would have been great had Cyrus prevented the return of the Jews to Jerusalem, and the consequent production of the work.

605. It does not appear that in point of authenticity and reliability the New Testament has much advantage over the Old. The books composing it, like the books composing the Old Testament, are mostly by unknown writers, and were not, except in a few instances, written by the persons whose names they bear. I cannot think the truth of the matter has been made known to the world by those who have labored to circulate the volume.

606. There is very little ground for believing that the books of the New Testament had an origin any more divine than the millions of volumes that have been produced since. They contain nothing above the power of men to write, nothing that would seem to require divine aid. The four gospels are simply narratives, and, whether true or untrue, they contain nothing but what men of ordinary ability could easily write. The epistles are merely letters from one person to others, and it can be truthfully claimed that many other letters that have been written are equal to them in matter and ability.

607. I do not believe that the books named after Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were written by the persons whose names they bear. Not one of them was known to be in existence till the latter part of the second century. Other gospels pronounced spurious had an earlier existence, but it cannot be shown that either of the four canonical gospels was known before the year 180. Irenæus was the first to mention them, and there are the strongest reasons for believing that they were fabricated, or made up of what were called spurious gospels which were known earlier.

608. I cannot believe that a scrap, a sentence, or a word written by Jesus has been handed down to posterity. There is nothing to show that a line was ever written by him.

609. I do not believe that liue written by his disciples or immediate attendants has been transmitted down to us. The gospels of Matthew and John, so-called, clearly were not written by them. They were not known till nearly a hundred and fifty years after the events narrated were said to have occurred. If the apostles wrote anything it has surely been lost.

610. However important the sayings of Jesus may be supposed to be to the world, they were not taken down at the time they were spoken, nor soon afterward, but the matter was deferred for many years, even to the latter part of the following century. I cannot believe that under such circumstances the report can be reliable, or that we have in any way a correct version of what he did say. We well know that a discourse written down from memory is necessarily very incorrect; and if this is deferred for ten, twenty, thirty, and fifty years, the probability of the incorrectness of the report is immensely increased; and if this report is not written out till nearly a hundred and fifty years after the discourses were spoken, and when all the persons who heard them were dead and buried, and the report is written by those who were not living when the discourses were given, they cannot by any possibility be correct or worthy of credit.

611. I cannot believe that the world has been treated fairly in this matter. Certain things are presented to us and called the utterances of Jesus, not a word of which he ever wrote, not a word of which was written by any person who heard him, and which we have no grounds to believe were written for near a century and a half after they were spoken, when the persons who wrote out the reports knew nothing whatever of what had been said before they were born.

612. The oldest list of the books of the New Testament was made by Marcion about the year 140. It contained ten of the epistles of Paul, but neither of the four gospels in our canon. He knew nothing of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. After him the list was interminably modified, added to, and taken from; but there is nothing to show that there was any authority, much less any divine evidence, pertaining to the collection. It seems to have been wholly subject to human manipulation and human judgment. If the divine power which is supposed to reside in the upper regions, and to rule all the affairs of this world, took any special interest in it, he gave not the least indication of the fact.

The Social Status of Liberalism.

It cannot be denied that Liberalism, while well developed in its philosophical bearings, is yet lacking and lagging in its social aspect. This fact is to be deplored, for, when the social faculties are rounded and developed, men and women grow into higher and grander thought, stronger and sturdier principles; but neglected, they become cold, isolated, careless, indifferent. That the latter is too much the case is exemplified in nearly all our towns and villages. Those who hav outgrown the old barbarisms of religious slavery, disgusted with the emptiness of popular creeds, and, having become enriched by new and vital experiences, are too apt to sink back within themselvs, satisfied in their own minds, thinking that if they subscribe for a Liberal newspaper or two, read the Liberal books and pamphlets, they are accomplishing all that is required of them.

This is a sad mistake. More is required. We are social factors in the universe. And in proportion as the powers of theology wane, humanity, long crushed and held in subjection, rises to the surface. It is not enough that we know the truth or take measures to promulgate it. We require hearty sympathy, coöperation, appreciation, the "well done" spoken here and now. We need the grasp of the hand strong and tender, social recognition from those of our own way of thinking, an interest in our ways, thoughts, movements. The beautiful, the poetic, the finer side of life will hav expression, and demands a hearing, and the sooner it is understood that the social nature of man cannot be crushed or confined in narrow borders without harm the better for all concerned.

Nothing is more apparent than the sometime dissolution of theological bands and religious companies, and the fact is significant that such are largely held together now by ties of social sympathy. The human heart craves this and will not be denied it. And while we batter down the old fabrics, if humanity is to go on higher – and it is— new temples dedicated to these beating, throbbing hearts around us must arise and bless the world.

"To destroy we must replace," and that quickly. Minds that hav been stifled, suffocated, in the atmosphere of a dull and sluggish past crave something better of the new future—some place where mind may meet mind on common and kindred ground, where ideas may be met and exchanged, and elevating influences be an inspiration to loftier and nobler endeavors. And when Liberalism breaks ground with such an achievement in view, we feel sure the grandest possible results will be obtained.

All over the land are scattered thousands and thousands, who are in one common bond of symathy with Liberals everywhere, yet, socially, they are all alone. Outside of the lecture hall there is no place to meet, no libraries, no reading-rooms, no parlors, and few friendships; and often such wander into the churches, the social fairs there, the church exhibitions, etc., for want of a better place to go.

These scattered forces should be recalled and the demand for sociability answered.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer has struck the very heart of the subject in his plan for a temple of Freethought in New York to meet the wants of a growing Liberal thought. All praise and honor to that large-hearted individual, and I heartily appreciate his efforts in the direction indicated; for this is the need, not alone in New York, but everywhere, in every town, village, and hamlet—wherever truth has sown a seed or superstition raised its head.

O humanity! no temple can be too grand for thee, no picture too costly, no mosaic too fine, no music too sweet, no surroundings too noble, too beautiful, or too exalted!

For thee should be gathered the truest, noblest, best of earth's offerings, and by the cultivation of thy finest social nature shalt thou become fitted to enjoy the purest and best this life affords.

Fall River, Mass. SUSAN H. WIXON.

Obituary.

DIED.—In Port Oshawa, on Tuesday, Sept. 27, 1881, Fred. R. Henry, aged 26 years, 10 months, and 24 days.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I now write you of the death of a dear brother that died in the faith of Liberalism. He said, just before he died, that he wished to die as he had lived. One world at a time, he said, was all he could attend to. His friends, all being Christians, tried in every way to persuade him to change his belief, but it was of no avail. He had been a Liberal for some years. What seemed all the more strange to the public, his grandfather was a minister, and all his friends (there are a great many of them, all living in the same place) embrace the Christian faith and are members of the church. Mr. Editor, please publish this, for there are only a few Liberals in this section, and if one dies in the faith we feel we want every one in the broad land to know it. Bro. Henry died of typhoid fever, after lingering over three weeks, suffering very much, and was conscious nearly all the time.

QUARTZBURG, IND. TER., Oct. 2, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav made a raise of two more names to the round-the-world fund, rather at a late hour, but better late than never. Inclosed please find the sum of $10 per registered letter, with names, Hans Michaelson and James Wilson, each one copy.

Yours truly, A. G. PHILLIP.

FAIRBURG, NEB.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 for the trip of Mr. Bennett round the world. I wish him success.

Your friend, THEODORE DAPP.

DEL NORTE, COL., Oct. 8, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed I send you $5 for Round-the-World fund. Hope I am not too late.

Yours respectfully, J. H. BUSH.

ZIG, MO., Sept. 29, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I hav been a reader of your paper for some time. I can think of no better way to spend $5 than in aiding you on your long journey, for I know the book will be well worth the money. Inclosed find $5, which please accept, together with my best wishes for your safe return to meet the many friends that await you.

Yours with esteem, AMY C. MILLIKEN.

CHELSEA, Oct. 9, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10. Hoping you will sail along as bravely as you did when the old chief was in rison, knowing that you and Mrs. Bennett will keep the THE TRUTH SEKEER alive, as before and hoping friend Bennett will return in good health and liv a good many years to fight the church, I remain, Your friend, MISS N. J. HENDERSON.

JOSEPH, OREGON, Oct. 2, 1881.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT: An Infidel wedding has just taken place in our embryo town, and the undersigned "principal parties" would respectfully ask you to partake of the bride's cake, a piece of which we hav mailed to you. It is a long way to send wedding cake, but, you know, an Infidel wedding is no common affair. Would even send Mr. Bennett a wee bit if we were sure it would reach him. Please giv Mr. Macdonald and the employees of THE TRUTH SEEKER office a taste. We don't boast of the extra quality of the article itself, but it may be somewhat novel to partake of genuin Infidel cake from three thousand miles away. We are both readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and out-and-out Liberals. You may be sure no whining prayers or other religious mummery formed any part in the marriage ceremony.

Respectfully yours, W. J. and CLARA B. DEAN.

[We are much obliged to friend Dean and his young bride for remembering us in the distribution of their cake and good wishes. Genuin "Infidel cake" is indeed too much of a rarity. Too often Liberals are induced to let the priest officiate at their marriage. This is wrong. Marriage is a civil contract, not made in heaven; the partners are responsible to civil authorities, and the priest should be made to keep his indelicate hands off. We are glad friends Dean hav taken the sensible course. When Infidel weddings are popular the hold of superstition upon the people will be less. We send our congratulations to the groom and bride. May their marital happiness last as long as their lives, and their lives last long beyond the three score years and ten.—ED. T. S.]

TURNBULL, ALA., Oct. 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I am delighted with your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope its good cause will spread from pole to pole. I hope its dying words will be, "I leave this world better than I found it."

Yours truly, MISS SALLIE GRAHAM.

ELMWOOD, ILL., Oct. 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 for trial subscribers. Your trumpet givs no uncertain sound, and I like to hear it ring out here on the prairies. "Blow ye the trumpet, blow," and never blow for anything less than liberty for man, woman, and child.

Yours, F. WATKINS.

SARANAC, MICH., Oct. 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. My present subscription expires on the 15th. I cannot get along without the paper. Those letters from around the world can't be beat.

Yours for truth and death to superstition,

W. G. CLARK.

WINCHESTER, ILL., Oct. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: For one whole year I hav been reading the good old TRUTH SEEKER, and I hav not been able to pay for it until now. I hav looked for it and devoured its contents with as much good relish as I hav my physical food. It is food for me—the richest and most nourishing mental food; it has lifted me above superstition and showed me the true path of life. I love the dear TRUTH SEEKER.

I was once a poor blinded theological student who bent every nerve and muscle toward solving the problem of immortality—our duty and relation to an unknown and unknowable God. Now I am a happy Liberal, who sees that man's highest duty is to labor for the good of humanity and to leave the gods to hoe their own rows. I hav been closely pressed by Christian persecutors since I left the fold, and hard has the struggle been. Yet my head is still above water.

I am happy to be able to send you the inclosed $4 to pay for my subscription for the past year. I hope to be able to send the balance soon.

Yours for liberty, J. B. TRAVERS.

ANGOLA, IND., Oct. 10, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Once more we humble ourselvs before thee, thanking thee for the many blessings thou hast showered upon us in times that are past. We thank thee for visiting our house once every seven days with thy smiling and intelligent countenance. We thank thee that thou hast not forsaken us as the orthodox God has forsaken my orthodox neighbors, letting his windows of heaven open and showering down ten times as much rain as they need for sprouting their clover-seed, and rotting their corn. Oh, how thankful we are, dear TRUTH SEEKER, that thou art not such a foolish nonentity!

We still further thank thee that thy dear old head, D. M. Bennett, is traveling over other countries, sending to us each week his greatest of all blessings, —the truthful account of things and peoples of other lands. And we thank the editor for not cutting us off in our sins and shortcomings in not paying up our quarterage to THE TRUTH SEEKER as we ought to. And now, beloved old TRUTH SEEKER, we will inclose post-office order for three dollars, which you will please credit to my subscription to your dear old self. And we still pray that thou wilt continue thy weekly visits for a thousand years to come, and then don't stop. For Bennett's and my sake, Amen.

C. H. WOODWORTH.

DANVILLE, ILL,, Oct. 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please forward my paper to Danville, Illinois, as I have changed my stopping-place. I was one of the many who were going to send Mr. Bennett out among them, but my liberal qualities greatly overbalanced my financial ones in quantity, and I was compelled to hav a silent tongue. I hav been reading your appeals to the readers, including myself, with a shocking countenance, knowing I could not send in the money, but perhaps I'll hav a chance to help him come home. Excuse me for being poor. The future may better my condition.

WM. J. GLAESER.

TOLEDO, OHIO, Oct. 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Having recently become a careful reader of your royal paper, I am so well pleased with its tone and spirit that I cannot resist the temptation to write a word in connection therewith. I am, and hav been for a long time, an unqualified believer in the entire freedom of thought and speech, and especially as to all kinds of religion or religious dogmas; and the frank, outspoken style and character of your paper, and of such correspondents as our friend Winter of Cincinnati, and Moore of Michigan, are decidedly refreshing to read and ponder upon; their unqualified condemnation of the mythical and mystical nonsense of all kinds is of the right ring. I am heartily pleased to see such men, and also to see and hear our great and fearless men of the Ingersoll, Tyndall, and Huxley order all over the land doing such grand and telling work in the way of wiping out the ignorance and superstition manifested by the various dispensers of pulpit nonsense and necromancy that hav kept thousands groping in the dark for ages past; and at the same time our noble men who unqualifiedly condemn church foolery are doing an equal amount of good in the same frank and outspoken condemnation of so-called Spiritualism, and render to us their writings and giv us the sound of their voices in lectures direct from their mouths, lavishing facts copiously and fearlessly in the place of the former sounds that everywhere meet our ears of drawling, see-saw old camp-meeting songs of deluded children and dyspeptic and doting old men and women, who make night hideous with their howling, and the monotonous tum-tum, ding-dong, and the sawings on an old fiddle and banjo and bell-jingling, characteristic of the glum old Spiritual cabinet.

Common sense is in demand these days. Let every encouragement be extended for the great reform, so much needed in our land, and let the true definition of that so much abused word, Infidelity, be fully given through every channel, and great good must emanate from the combined action.

Yours for truth and reform, M. O. WAGGONER.

MENDON, MICH., Oct. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in your paper the historical account by Mr. Abbott of Cain's wife's folks. Now I claim to be as well posted in the history of that people as he is, and I am satisfied he is entirely wrong. The long space he occupies is surely against its correctness. I will make a simple statement of facts. When God made the world, as related in the first chapter of Genesis, everything was right, and God made man and woman equal and gave them perfect liberty to eat, drink, and enjoy themselvs. And God, after taking a good rest, went back home where the gods liv. And this pair went on increasing for a long time—I do not recollect exactly how long, but several thousand years, however, for they had become a great nation. About this time there had grown up among the gods a proud, fickle-minded, revengeful, and rather ignorant god, and on account of these qualities they called him Lord God. This made him mad, and he just straddled his white mule and left, and came to this world God had made many thousand years before. Seeing it was not all occupied, he concluded he would start a colony of his own, that he could domineer over just as he saw fit. So he squatted on an unoccupied tract and hitched up his mule and ploughed a piece of land and set out an orchard. Well, after the trees got big enough to bear he thought it safe to start his colony, or at least to hav a man to till his ground. So he mounted his mule and rode back where he saw so many people, and after tying his white mule in the bushes, he crept out and soon discovered a stupid-looking man standing with his back toward him. So he crept up behind him and gave him a blow on the head that stunned him, but did not materially injure him. He then grabbed him up, mounted his mule, and back he rode to his new home. When the man came to he flattered him up with fine stories; but he soon found he was not going to be contented alone, so he gave him some poppy tea, which made him go to sleep. Then he mounted his mule again and away he went to the settlement. He soon discovered a very pretty girl alone picking berries. He seized her and brought her home with him. When the man waked up he told him he had made the girl out of one of his ribs, and that he might hav her for his wife and slave. The man did not believe the yarn, but did not care where she came from as long as he could get so pretty a girl for his wife, for he had tried several times before to get a wife, but no one would hav him on account of his stupidity and want of manliness. As the remainder of this history is written out in the Bible I need say no more, only that after the mutton and cabbage feast and the murder, Cain got discontented, so his father gave him a letter of introduction to his grandfather's folks, and he went back and lived with them and became quite a man.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 28, 1881.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to another one yet partly enslaved in the darkness of popedom. I think that your noble paper will be a big help in bringing him out of the dark dungeon of superstition.

Yours with a true heart for the cause,

J. M. A. RICKNER.

ALTOONA, PA., Oct. 9, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Bennett's tour through the Holy Land and among the wonders of the orient will no doubt be read with the most intense interest by every member of the "starry galaxy." I feel proud to be a member of that cluster of stars, and truly think that all who hav so kindly contributed hav not only added honor to themselvs but paid a golden tribute to Mr. Bennett. Illustrating the books will be very expensiv, and as five dollars is a very low price for two or three such volumes, I therefore send you an extra dollar. I also inclose fifty cents, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial for three months to inclosed address, a lady residing in Milroy, Pa., a place where Presbyterianism has held sway for many years, and where a TRUTH SEEKER can seldom be found.

Kindly yours, W. J. BURS.

OTTUMWA, IOWA, Sept. 30, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for this year, hoping the truth will liv and Bro. Bennett make a successful tour around the world. His letters are certainly very interesting, and he is the best descriptiv writer I ever read. With best wishes to you all, I remain, Yours, BERT. WHITE.

ORANGE, N. J., Oct. 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I happened to take up your paper from a friend's table, and was so delighted with it that I send fifty cents for a trial subscription. Are the Freethinkers and Liberals the same club? I was very enthusiastic over Mr. Palmer's project, and as soon as the time comes to begin the temple I would like to giv my mite. From a little girl I hav longed for the day to come when humanity may be enlightened and freed from its bigotry.

Being poor, I cannot do for the world at large, yet in my own quiet home I am not idle; and above all I am patient, and giv my sympathy and counsel to many who are thirsty after such knowledge as your paper contains.

I believe in a spiritual world, but am not entirely pleased with Spiritualism. We are trying to organize a club of some kind, and hav invited mediums to assist, but are not pleased with their control; so we hav concluded to depend on ourselvs at present.

Yours respectfully, MRS. MARY A. GORSLINE.

BART, PA., Sept. 24, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hav just read "The Bible of Bibles," by Kersey Graves. It is the clearest and most exhaustiv work I hav yet seen against the Bible and Christianity. Unlike Paine, Graves has collected from all historical sources knowledge and facts to prove his position, and most ably and truly does he do it. He has not left an inch of ground for the friends of the Bible and of Christianity to stand upon, but has annihilated every vestige of proof, if there ever was any, that Christianity is anything but a stupendous delusion. He has most thoroughly proven and given facts to clearly show that Christianity. like all religions, is man-made, and consequently is nothing but a gigantic fraud and a delusion. He has made this so clear that any person whose mind is unbiased by prejudice, and who is willing to abide by the light of reason, cannot fail to see. Therefore I would say to all persons who wish to learn the truth, they should read this work. But all those who will not investigate, but go it blind, and are content to let the priest do their thinking, had better not read it, for it will be like throwing pearls before swine, and be lost labor. This is fast becoming an age of reason and cience, but such persons hardly belong to this age, but more properly belong to the ages that are past and gone.

There is now a great amount of Liberal and Infidel literature published. One can hardly go amiss for it, but the "Bible of Bibles" is one of the very best of Infidel works. Every Liberal should hav this, not because they need it individually, for Infidels don't need anything new, but to lend around among their Christian neighbors and friends. Could this work be generally read by Christians, and could they throw away their prejudices, that old barbarian Jew book would soon become of no account, like witchcraft a thing of the past. J. M. KING.

ANGOLA, IND., Sept. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Believing that your numerous readers will not object to learning what the Liberalists are doing in old Angola, I wish, with your permission, to say through the columns of your excellent paper that we hav had the pleasure of listening to three able lectures by Mrs. Lake, also one reading for the benefit of the Michigan fire sufferers. Mrs. Lake is certainly one of the brighter stars of the galaxy of Liberal lecturers, and the Liberalists are highly pleased with her success in this place, and feel proud of her as one of our ablest champions. Her efforts here hav been a complete success. She succeeded in drawing large audiences, notwithstanding the dark hints and strenuous efforts of the churches and their votaries to the contrary, and I think she has been the means of opening the eyes of many to their best interests and noblest aims. I hav listened to many able orators in my life on both sides, and I do not think that I am saying too much when I say she has no superior in the lecture field, either as a logician, orator, or elocutionist. With her mental attainments, gigantic intellect, full and complete command of language, and last, but not least, her ladylike demeanor she is a host within herself in the Liberal cause, and cannot do otherwise than command the respect of every liberal-minded man and woman with whom she comes in contact, and I most sincerely and heartily commend her to the Liberalists everywhere. Such a woman is a blessing to mankind, and and I only regret that we hav so few of that kind of women, and which it seems to me is all chargeable to the manner in which they hav been heretofore educated under the teaching of the Bible and its structure, the church, which has always made them believe they were dependent upon and inferior to men (I mean males); but, thanks to the efforts of Liberalism, the dark clouds are beginning to pass off from the sky of woman, and she will soon stand in the position designed by nature for her, viz., man's equal in all respects. "So may it be."

It may be thought from what I hav said that I am a disciple of Mrs. Lake in all her doctrinal points, but let me say right here that such is not the case, and cannot be, as I am a firm believer in Materialism in its fullest sense, and she is as firm a believer in Spiritualism; so it will readily be seen that on what she considers one of the most important points in her system of belief we differ as widely as the churches differ from me, but I do admire talent wherever found, whether it is in or out of the church, and she has the same right to her opinion that I hav to mine—that is Liberalism.

With profound respect for the subject of this letter and yourself, I am, as ever,

JOHN K. MORROW.

LIBERTY, KAN., Sept. 8, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me that "awful paper" for another year. I suppose that dollars on which are written "In God we trust" will be good. Of course you trust in him. Yours, J. E. HOLMES.

EDEN MILLS, VERMONT, Oct. 7, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is five dollars for your round-the-world trip, provided you go, but if you should be prevented from going by any cause, especially death, and that should take place before the funds now raised for the round-the-world trip are expended, I suggest that the $5.00 go toward a fund of $150,000 for the benefit of Mrs. Bennett, hoping the fund may swell to $300,000, as it has for Mrs. Garfield, as I consider Mrs. Bennett as meritorious as Mrs. Garfield, and both she and the world would suffer as great a loss in the death of Mr. Bennett as the wife and country of the late President did in his loss, although I greatly sympathize with Mrs. Garfield and the world in the death of our worthy President. Yours, in the interest of humanity,

C. A. WHITE.

OMAHA, NEB., Oct. 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see by my tab that my time has come. Satisfied with the great minds that speak through your paper, I will not at this time say a word. I think the Spiritual and Material elements are grand subjects for discussion. I love the paper. It is solid granit rock. I am never happier than when pulling down some of that rotten old structure, superstition. I hope the time is not far off when my affairs in court will be settled, as I wrote to you twelve months ago. Then I shall be able to hav books and means at my disposal, but now my hands are tied. The paper and its contents are to me like a bright spring morning. I am a life-subscriber to the brilliant sheet. I hope when I write you again I shall be able to send you twenty dollars. but now I send you two, and shall be one of those who will welcome back the grand hero of the nineteenth century. I am one of the grand army that can see his worth to the human family. With kind regards to you and the brave little woman, Mrs. Bennett, I am yours, W. L. GRAY.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., Sept. 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. I would like to send five dollars to help Mr. Bennett around the world, but I cannot spare it at present. I think I will send it yet, for I believe his book will be worth reading. Truth is what I want to find, and I hope Mr. Bennett will be able to advance still better ideas than he could before he started, although he did well before he left. I think there is something to be learned every day, and even the wisest of persons can learn more.

I wish to say to T. Winter that there is something for him to learn yet. Just please lay away your orthodox jealousy, Mr. Winter, and seek for the truth. Then you will find that you will never get too old to learn something more in this world. You say that Spiritualists are lunatics or fools. According to the Bible you will be a damned man for talking that way. Please for your own sake remember that God (or nature) created one as well as the other, and when you say fool remember the consequence.

I claim to be an earnest, honest seeker after truth, liberty, and knowledge, and I regard you as a man that needs the true light and truth. When you get that you will be a good Spiritualist as well as a Liberalist. MRS. ANTHONY BAKER.

MISSOURI VALLEY, IOWA, Sept. 31, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: The tab on my paper reminds me that it is time for me to renew my subscription. Please to find three dollars for the same, five dollars for Mr. Bennett's travels around the world, and two dollars for "Antichrist." SAMUEL CLARK.

MEMPHIS, MO., Oct., 12, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Some weeks since an article against Spiritualism by Mr. D. D. Lake appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the main points of which I saw to be erroneous from having attended nearly three hundred of Mott's seances.

I took the liberty, therefore, to address a brief and friendly letter to him, hoping that he might place a slight degree of confidence even in a stranger. I kept no duplicate, but suppose I described some of the phenomena that I had witnessed.

Now I see by your last issue that he has addressed quite a long open letter to me. Had he given my brief note too—if my recollection serves me it was brief—I should probably not trouble you with this; but as it is, perhaps you will allow me a few words of rejoinder.

He asks, "If the truths of Spiritualism are such as you would fain hav me to believe them to be, why resort to all this preparation in order to demonstrate that which should be common to the whole human family?"

He might with about the same pertinency ask the astronomer, "Why the Dickens do you build your observatories, construct your telescopes and other paraphernalia, and go out o' nights, like lunatics, to observe the appearances of heavenly bodies, or make new discoveries of planets, satellites, or comets? All these things ought to be known to the whole human family without all this nonsense."

In another place, "If you are sincere in your endeavor to convert me [I giv it up as hopeless] and others to the faith, I will offer to any person the opportunity of proving to me the truthfulness of the theory you advocate on these conditions, that we proceed to the top of one of the highest mountain peaks near by, and there, in open daylight, without any preparation, and in the the presence of all that may be there congregated (you would draw a host) perform," etc.

By parity of reasoning—or, to use a Carlyleism, unreasoning—friend Lake might say to a philosopher, "If you will go with me to the top of the mountain which was the last to be submerged by Noah's flood, with none of your usual traps, with no camera or chemicals, and there at high noon, with nothing to shield us from the sun, produce a perfect photo of myself as large as life, you will convince me that photography is a fixed fact, and I'll take the picture."

But, mirth aside, I'll venture that friend Lake has never investigated the subject. And I commend this extract to his attention: "The truly sane man has no opinion with regard to a matter about which he knows nothing. If you hav not investigated Spiritualism confess your ignorance when it is broached in your presence; when you are appealed to neither affirm nor deny, but wait until knowledge is yours." Remember that there are many scientists second to none in the world who, after careful examination, are avowed Spiritualists. STEPHEN YOUNG.

BURNIP'S CORNERS, MICH., Oct. 10, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Since I wrote you the 6th, I hav secured a trial subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I feel certain of obtainining another name in a few days. If I do, it will be an A No. 1 name. That, with the one I now send, will, in all probability, become regular subscribers. Could probably secure a number of names for "regulars" had I only time to spare and health to enable me to canvass, and the assistance of some of your posters, which I would like to hav some two or three dozen more of.

Burnip's Corners is a centrally located point for Freethinkers, and in a circuit of six miles from this point there can be found from fifty to one hundred stanch Liberals. Yet strange enough there is no Liberal League near here that I am aware of, and it seems to be up-hill business trying to get a start in that direction. The trouble is we havn't any recognized leader, and no one who can or is disposed to speak in public for the Liberal cause. There is none among my acquaintances of Freethinkers who is not in private outspoken and radical in the expression of his religious opinions, and some are able advocates of Liberalism and Infidelity vs. Christianity and superstition, and as many as I hav conversed with on the subject assent very readily to the usefulness of a Liberal League, and think a great amount of good would be the inevitable result of an organization of one here, but all seem to hav a dislike, for some undiscovered reason, of being the one to make the start. For my own part, I confess to be of the same fault. There are many more fitted than myself in many or all ways. I am but a young man, as well as a young convert to hereticism. My influence is not sufficient and of a nature to be successful in such an enterprises; besides, I am unqualified by nature and unfitted in educational accomplishments to undertake anything of this kind.

I hav written Prof. Jamieson for a course of lectures, but in his reply he does not promis a visit to us here in the very near future, and I know of no other speaker near enough to be had without incurring more expense than could be raised, I fear, in this locality, although I am or feel certain a course of lectures could be made profitable as well as useful in this place by one capable of handling successfully his subjects, and am almost as sure a League can be organized at the close of the course with a good showing of membership to start with, which I imagin would be somewhat obnoxious to the numerous little gospel shops in this vicinity.

It is noticeable here, as almost everywhere else, I suppose, that orthodoxy is on the decline; indeed it is so much so as to call out remarks and comments by all who express themselvs on the subject. The absolute facts are that the churches of this town, excepting the Lutheran and Catholic (of which I am not informed), cannot show more than fifty per cent of membership that they had ten years ago—that is, comparing the population of to-day with that of 1871 of the town, and I am not sure that the actual membership is larger, even if it is as full, as at that time, to say nothing of the population, which has very largely increased in the time. This, in my opinion, is a good sign, and is as it should be; and Liberalism must make the numbers supporting mythological tyranny continue to grow small and at a more rapid rate.

In view of this position of affairs, a question naturally arises, Do we need anything in the place of the dying church? to which I suggest an answer, Yes! to which very naturally arises a second question, What shall it be, or what will you giv in its place? to which I again suggest the answer, Liberal Leagues, good, healthy organized Freethinker's societies, which do not petrify or decline, but are founded on principles that will admit of nothing but advancement, and therefore keep pace with time, and in so doing must of necessity promulgate usefulness, intelligence, and their necessary result, good will, peace on earth, and happiness to man and woman kind. But I see I hav now written three times as much as I intended when I began, and what I had no idea of writing. I will close for fear of boring you as well as the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER should this be fortunate enough to escape the waste-basket—perhaps its most proper terminus as a beginner's scrib.

Yours for truth and reform, F. E. STURGIS.

A PIOUS critic asks, "What is there in nature to go back to?" I would answer, All, everything! To liv pure, good, true, and happy lives is to "go back to nature." To study the needs of the whole human system; to develop every faculty of both mind and body to just that state of perfection which will make the entire being as much of a man as he is capable of becoming, is "going back to nature."

To love truth, to love our kind, and to continually improve upon all that is, is nature; is the best and highest nature we know of. This will carry us, as a race, infinitly farther onward and upward, than any hight ever reached by either men or gods is the heretofore. Sun-worshipers hav left records for us to admire and to copy, and so hav all other worshipers that hav ever lived.—E. D. Slenker.

The God and Devil of Orthodoxy.

If the story of God and the Bible is true,
And that God and the devil distinctly are two,
Let us ask a few questions; and here we begin:
Who is the creator and author of sin?
Who made the old devil and taught him to talk,
And deceive Mother Eve while taking a walk?
If God did the whole, he is the author of all;
Then he planned it expressly and willed we should fall.

Then he curses the woman and curses the man,
Where, where is the wisdom that started this plan?
For sickness and hunger, bloodshed and death,
Was cursed by the curse of an angry God's breath.
He filled this beautiful earth with thorns,
Made ravenous beasts, and beasts that hav horns;
All, all to augment the misery of man.
Pray, who can see wisdom in all of this plan?

Then the man was sent forth by the force of God's will,
By the sweat of his brow the land he must till,
And to earn his own bread, a reward for his evil,
Pray who is at fault, is it God or the devil?
When the devil upset the plan that God made.
And with his sly cunning gets the best of the trade,
God then repented that he had made man,
And was grieved at his heart o'er his foolish plan.

Now we find the old worthies each playing a game,
We will call the game grab, for that must be its name.
And for Adam's descendants, an innumerable host,
God grabs with the devil to see who will get most.
Now, Arch Jimmy club-foot is quite sure to win,
And sweep the whole board, then sit down with a grin;
Then God in his anger drowned near the whole,
He only saved Noah, "the righteous old soul."

And the few that were with him, he saved in the ark;
They sailed o'er the waters so stormy and dark,
Yet his Satanship laughed to see all this plan,
For he has had the best grab ever since he began.
Then this God would get angry and break o'er his rules—
'Tis said, "Anger rests only in the bosom of fools;"
He would send out his armies and set them all fighting,
Just the thing that the devil took the greatest delight in.

When Judah fought with his own brother Ben,
God started the fuss and furnished the men;
God fought for old Judah and all of his host,
But he lost fifteen thousand of soldiers the most.
Now a prophet once saw this God of the Jews
With his gates left ajar, then he told all the news;
He held there a council with the hosts around his throne,
To see who would kill Ahab—just Ahab alone.

Now one planned on this wise, and another on that,
When out came a spirit, with wings like a bat;
"If it please your great honor," he said to the Lord,
"I will do up the job, if you just say the word."
"Wherewith shalt thou do it?" the Lord said to him.
"I will be a bold liar," he replied with a vim;
"I will enter the mouths of thy prophets," he said;
"I will hunt down old Ahab till I know he is dead."
"Now go forth and do so," the Lord replied,
"You suit my best purpose you'll be justified."
Then the Lord employed him, the Devil's own boy,
To answer his purpose, men's lives to destroy.
Now God has told us that in heaven so fair,
No liar shall enter, or murderer there,
But the devil, you see, has those imps of his own,
All ready for action, around the white throne.

It would tire to tell of David and Goliah,
And of Moses the thief, the murderer, and the liar,
And of Rahab the harlot, that told many lies,
With the Egyptian midwives whom God justifies.
Of Samson, the strong man, Solomon, the buster,
And Aaron, the priest, that wore a big duster,
Who sits with God, enjoying his glories,
With Jonah and others, telling fish stories.

But only to think of the wonderful tales
Of the frogs and lice, then the shower of quails,
That God sent his children, for a sort of a treat:
He wanted to send them a plenty of meat.
Let us lay up a wall of the birds that fell round
The Israelite's camp, all over the ground,
It would reach 'round the world full twelve feet broad,
And eighty feet high—what a bountiful God!

Now all that believe these tales to be true,
Know that the devil's a Gentile and God is a Jew.
Yet how nicely they travel through thick and through thin,
Through blood and destruction their victims to win.
But God with great pity and with grief in his eyes
Sends his own darling son and for sinners he dies.
But after all this is it to be wondered,
How the devil subtracts ninety-nine from each hundred.

But when the day comes that burns as an oven,
And a fire descends from God out of heaven,
Who will hav a seat with the wonderful few;
Will it be Catholic, orthodox, Gentile, or Jew?
What becomes of the millions that ne'er heard of God,
And billions and billions that hav slept 'neath the sod,
That ne'er heard of Jesus or read of his name,
Or knew that from heaven to save us he came?

Now stop, says the churchman, you are taking great pains
To upset all our creeds and destroy priestly gains.
We hav fought for the Bible, our God e'er to please,
And waded in human gore up to our knees.
The path it has led us is marked well with blood,
No matter if we only get home to God.
There, free from all toil, we will rest from our labors,
And sing praises to God for damning our neighbors.

Oh, pity! oh, wonder, can men be so blind
As to take these old tales as a guide for mankind.
Why not do away with the old personal devil,
And personal God, as the author of evil.
For the Bible makes him out a knave and a fool,
A licentious murderer, a cat's-paw and tool,
For the devil to perpetrate most of his deeds,
Called "the God of all wisdom" by most of the ceeds.

Let him go and remain with the myths of the past,
To the moles and bats let his doings be cast,
Let us worship the spirit, with spirit divine,
It filleth all space and endures to all time.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY, 129 East 28th st., New York.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. Price, $1.50. Sold by D. M. BENNETT,

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

EXTERNAL APPLICATION,

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. Price, 75 cents, pamphlet; $1, bound.

Gems of Thought.

I CLAIM that in all lines leading to the highest welfare of humanity, woman is the leader and guide. If man's "labors brought on the war with Southern slave-holders and broke up slavery with the sword," our friends must remember that it was the "power behind the throne"—woman's voice, woman's work, and woman's counsels, that did much to urge on the work for freedom and justice; only man in his mad rush for vengeance flew to the sword and inaugurated a long and bloody war, while woman's voice would hav been for arbitration and other civilized, moral, and enlightened modes of accomplishing the great and good work. —Elmina Drake Slenker.

I SUPPOSE that, at bottom, many of these Norsemen were forest-fellers as well as fighters, though the Skalds talk mainly of the latter, misleading certain critics not a little; for no nation of men could ever liv by fighting alone; there could not produce enough come out of that. I suppose the right good fighter was oftenest also the right good forest-feller—the right good improver, discerner, doer, and worker of every kind; for true valor, different enough from ferocity, is the basis of all. A more legitimate kind of valor that; showing itself against the untamed forests and dark brute powers of nature, to conquer nature for us. In the same direction hav not we, their descendants, since carried it far? May such valor last forever with us.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

THERE is danger lest the transcendental religionist should despise the past and its solemn teachings, should take a fancy, personal and fugitiv, for a fact of universal consciousness, embrace a cloud for an angel, and miserably perish. It is not for man to transcend his faculties, to be above himself, above reason, conscience, affection, religion, beside himself. Madmen in religion are not rare, enthusiasts, fanatics.—Theodore Parker.

THE being of a God to me is as certain as my own existence. Yet when I look out of myself into the world of men, I see a sight that fills me with unspeakable distress. The world of men seems simply to giv the lie to that great truth of which my whole being is so full. If I looked into a mirror and did not see my face, I should experience the same sort of difficulty that comes upon me when I look into the living, busy world and see no reflection of its creator.—Cardinal Newman.

THE second epistle bearing the name of Peter (which, for other reasons, is regarded as of later origin) is reactionary upon the topic of Christ's second coming, and complains that men ask, "Where is the promis of his coming?"—a question that necessarily arose when time had passed on, and "things continued as they were from the beginning." A most evasiv explanation is there given: viz., that a thousand years are, in God's estimate, but as one day. Thus God is made out to cheat us and mock our hankerings after just rules by telling us that he comes quickly, while, by such logic, the phrase may mean a million years or million millions as easily as a thousand.—F. W. Newman's Religion Not History.

I KNOW that if the record (of the Gospels) is trustworthy Jesus did not consider himself perfect. He was baptized in Jordan, "confessing his sins." He said, "Why callest thou me good?" I must confess I honor more the daring optimism of Father Taylor than "the swotten way of talking about Jesus"—to use the memorable words of the sainted Channing—in which avowed humanitarians frequently indulge. Dr. Bartol asked Father Taylor if he thought anybody else had ever been as good as Jesus. "Millions!" was the immediate response. And I should much rather believe this than believe that the character of Jesus was absolutely unique. I do not want his goodness to belittle all the other goodness in the world.—J. W. Chadwick.

WHOLESOME meats to a vitiated tomach differ little or nothing from unwholesome; and best books to a naughty mind are not unapplicable to occasions of evils. Bad meats will scarce breed good nourishment in the healthiest connection; but herein the difference is of bad books, that they to a discreet and judicious reader serve, in many respects, to discover, to confute, to forewarn, and to illustrate. . . . If it be true that a wise man, like a good refiner, can gather gold out of the drossiest volume, and that a fool will be a fool with the best book, yes, or without a book, there is no reason that we should deprive a wise man of any advantage to his wisdom, while we seek to restrain from a fool that which, being restrained, will be no hindrance to his folly.—Milton.

MY thoughts are with the dead; with them
I liv in long past years,
Their virtues love, their faults condemn,
Partake their griefs and fears;
And from their sober lessons find
Instruction with a humble mind.

My hopes are with the dead; anon
With them my place will be;
And I with them will travel on
Through all futurity;
Yet leaving here a name, I trust,
Which will not perish in the dust.

—Southey's Library.

THERE is clear truth in the idea that a struggle from the lower classes of society, toward the upper regions and rewards of society, must ever continue. Strong men are born there, who ought to stand elsewhere than there. he manifold, inextricably complex universal str ggle of these constitutes, and must constitute, w at is called the progress of society. For men of le ers, as for all other sorts of men. How to regulate that struggle. There is the whole question.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

SCRIBES and Pharisees might well cry out concerning Jesus: "Who is this that forgiveth sins? Who can forgiv sins but God only?" Christians who believe that the human Jesus was omniscient and therefore a searcher of men's hearts, find no difficulty at all, so far. But when the narrativ proceeds to represent Jesus as transferring this attribute of God to finite and imperfect man, Christians ought to be startled as well as Jews. Nothing but custom hinders their seeing its enormity, its impiety.—F. W. Newman.

Odds and Ends.

CHANG LEE, a Chinese resident of Cleveland, O, has applied for a divorce from the Irish girl he married. Mr. Lee has evidently learned what a skirmishing fund means.

THE following advertisment appears in a South African paper: "Ministers and others are respectfully requested not to marry Isaac Samson, who has already a wife and family."

A GREAT many people carry their religion on their sleeve, where it will be seen. In this connection it may be well to remark that when they die they never take their clothes to the place of judgment.

A CERTAIN doctor of divinity said every blade of grass was a sermon. The next day he was amusing himself by clipping his lawn, when a parishioner said, "That's right, doctor, cut your sermon's short."

A YOUNG lady admitted to her mother that her beau had kissed her on the cheek. "And what did you do?" asked the old lady, in a tone of indignation. "Mother," said the young lady, "I turned the other cheek."

IN Rocklin, Cal., the Congregational church has for two years been without a pastor. There is no rush of applicants for the vacant pulpit, as the church has only five members. The vacancy will probably continue for some time to come.

"AN esthetic discourse," said the Lady Althea to her husband, as they rode home from church. "Right you are," said Lord Algernon, who had found a soft place on the pew-rail for the repose of his lordly head. "It was anesthetic."

A LITTLE son of an evangelical clergyman "wished that he could die and go to heaven." "Why?" asks his grandmother, feeling that he is getting too good to liv. "'Cause I want to get some of the pennies I've been giving to God."

DE banjo—yum! If you want my dog, my hoss, my house an' lot, play me de banjo an' keep time wid yer fut. I 'spect the music of angelic harps am sweet an' soft an' dreamy, but if dey want to keep us cull'd folks satisfied up dar, a leetie more banjo an' a leetle less harp am de first prescription.

A FINANCIALLY-MINDED youth got up the following verse in a Detroit Sunday-school:

Should all the banks of England break,
Should England's bank be smashed,
Bring in your checks to Zion's bank,
And you will get them cashed.

A CLERGYMAN was once forced to say to a congregation that persisted in depositing buttons in the contribution box, "Brethren who wish to contribute buttons will please not hammer down the eyes, for while that process does not increase their value as coin, it does impair their usefulness as buttons."

THE rector of an infant church in South Carolina whose roll of members numbers exactly eight finds much comfort in the fact that just the same number of persons were in Noah's ark. When he shall hav a revival increasing the force by fifty per cent he will probably be thankful that the number equals that of the original apostles.

A TEMPERANCE agitator once remarked to Artemus Ward as the latter was about to take a drink: "Look not upon the wine when it is red in the cup."

"That ain't wine," said Artemus, "that's old rye."

"It biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder," continued the agitator.

"Oh, no it don't," retorted Artemus, "if you put plenty of sugar in it."

"WHAT hav you got there?" queried a temperance preacher to a young man who had a bottle wrapped in paper.

"Nothing," replied the young man.

"You are telling lies," said the preacher: "you hav old Nick there."

"Nay, but thou liest," replied the young man. "It's old Tom that I've got here."

A MAN who went West to "grow up with the country" has returned. He got there just in time to get acquainted with a tornado which was doing a little visiting in that section. The tornado took him up an exeeedingly high distance, and showed him all the possessions of the earth, and then let him drop down again. He says he has grown enough in the last few days to satisfy him for all the rest of his natural life.

"IF ye plaize, sorr, hav ye enny nice Sunday-school books or papers? Sure I want them for me little girl; she'll be going to Mr. Goodman's class at the church, sorr, yes sorr."

"What church?"

"Sure it's the Protestant church in the square beyant."

"Is your husband alive, Mrs. —— Mrs. ——?"

"Sure an' he is, sorr. God damn his sowl, the drunken owld vagabond."

"You're a religious person yourself, I perceive."

"Sure an' I am, sorr, the divil a hap'porth else!"

ROMANCE OF A CUCUMBER.

A cucumber green on the table lay,
Biding his swiftly-approaching death;
And he smiled at the vinegar over the way,
And unto the pepper and salt he saith,
"You'll keep me company, friends, I trust;
We'll die like Samson, if die we must."

A maiden sat in a chair hard by,
A beautiful maiden of supple grace,
And delicate features, and large blue eye,
And a rapturous transport over her face,
As that cucumber passed to its dreadful fate,
And the sunbeams danced on the empty plate.

A youth drove moodily home that night,
In the last faint streak of the twilight's blush;
And the moan as of one in a piteous plight
Invaded the evening's solemn hush.
One look at the river, one little splash,
And the eddy encircled the lover rash.

A sorrowing train with a tell-tale bier
Passed over the road to the family lot,
While the mourners gazed at the gardens near,
And the cucumbers whispered, "Forget us not."
One little spirit by angels blest,
One little stomach for aye at rest. —R. M. Field.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 8. No. 44. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, October 29, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A NEW scientific journal entitled Knowledge will shortly appear in London, under the editorship of Mr. Richard A. Proctor.

THE Iowa Methodist Conference severely reprimanded a minister for going to a circus, and made him promis never to do it again.

MR. ERASMUS A. DARWIN, whose personal estate exceeded $750,000, has left one-half of it and all his real estate to his brother, Mr. Chas. Robert Darwin, the eminent naturalist.

A RECENT religious census taken in Prussia shows that that country contains 17,645,462 Protestants, 9,205,136 Catholics, 363,790 Jews, 42,518 Dissenters, and 22,006 professing no religion.

IN the forty-four years during which Queen Victoria has occupied the English throne, she has spent about twelve days in Ireland. These twelve days represent the time occupied by two visits, the last of which took place twenty years ago.

THE Free Church in Creebridge, Highlands of Scotland, has been in a wrangle on the posture to be assumed in prayer. Some are in favor of sitting, against which many protested, threatening that if the communion were handed to them under such conditions they would fling them into the elders' faces.

WHILE rector of St. James Episcopal church, Philadelphia, the Rev. Marshall T. Meigs stole from the church fund and from a widow's estate, and finally absconded with a month's salary in advance. He now writes back to his friends that he evidently mistook his fitness for the ministry, and has gone into profitable mercantil employment abroad, whence he will soon send money to pay all claims.

IT is fortunate for the credit of womanhood that two homicides which hav just occurred in the West are attributable to sudden insanity. Dora G. Beyland, of Newport, Ohio, loved her little granddaughter devotedly, and was morbidly fearful that the child would grow up wicked. "How much better it would be if she died now, for in that case she would surely go to heaven." With that thought in her mind, she cut off the little one's head. The other case was at Springfield, Mo. Mary Dejarnett was excessivly nervous, and had been kept awake several nights by the crying of her stepchild, aged three. At length she killed it with a knife.

THE cholera is spreading in the East, and advancing toward Europe. It has already made considerable ravages at Aden, and has reached Mecca, where the Mussulmans are imploring their prophet. Two other epidemics attract serious attention. The first is the yellow fever in Senegal, where the number of victims has been great, and the second diphtheria, which has killed more people in the south of Russia than any other epidemic, not excepting the plague. It has prevailed there since 1872. In Bessarabia, 15,000 out of 36,000 persons who were attacked hav succumbed to it. Out of 46,000 cases 19,000 ended fatally, and in Kharkoff out of 29,000 cases there hav been 17,000 deaths.

MR. GOODWIN, editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, says, "But for the steady influx of foreigners, low, base-born foreigners, hereditary bondsmen, the two dreadful features of the Mormon church, polygamy and the exalting of the church over the state, would die out in America in two generations." The New York Tribune says, "This is firing in the air, because low, base-born foreigners and hereditary bondsmen in many instances make useful and liberty-loving citizens." And the Argonaut adds: "We say yes, but only when they are emancipated from the thralldom of ecclesiastical authority, and at liberty to think and act for themselvs. The religious bigot and bondsman is not and can never become a useful and liberty-loving citizen in any country."

IN the form of report employed by officers on guard at Gibraltar it is customary to insert if all has gone as usual, "N. B.—Nothing extraordinary." One day an officer fell down a precipice and was killed, but when the young Scotchman on guard handed in his guard report, "Nothing extraordinary" appeared on it. An explanation being demanded, the reply was: "Aweel, sir, I dinna think there's anything extraordinary. If he'd faun doon a precipice 400 feet and not been killed I should hae thought it vera extraordinary and would hae put it down in ma repoort."

ONE Sunday in the summer some of the men of a vessel at anchor off Colombo, Ceylon, went ashore in charge of a mate, and, while rambling in a wood, one picked up a little monkey which was playing at the foot of a tree. Its yells seemed to summon all monkeydom. Such a chorus of angry chatter arose that the mate cried, "Make for the boat," and the abductor, to make peace, dropped his prize. One monkey fell out of the phalanx to gather up its darling in a hasty embrace, but the rest rushed forward, hurling sticks and stones at the men as they pushed off. Many of the men were hurt by the missils.

A MEETING was held lately at the Mansion House, Dublin, the Lord Mayor presiding, to promote Irish industry. The first resolution was moved by the Lord Mayor elect, himself a large employer of labor, and seconded by Mr. La Touche, member of a commercial banking house of old standing and high position. Several other men of eminence, including Mr. Pim, M.P., who is the A. T. Stewart of Dublin, took part in the proceedings. Mr. Pim strongly deprecated any attempt to foster the manufacturing system in Ireland on sentiment, as it would, he said, be a failure. What needed encouragement in Ireland was a spirit of self-reliance. He pointed to the lack of coal as the great obstacle to manufacture. Mr. McCormick, president of the Silk Weavers' Society, complained that, whereas eighty years ago there were 2,400 looms working in Dublin, there are now ninety, and not a yard of ribbon is made.

IN speaking of the Methodist Conference which tried Dr. Thomas for heresy, the New York Times says: "The Conference has won the battle, but not in a way to reflect much glory on itself or the cause for which it contended. Dr. Thomas was clearly entitled to a fair trial; he was entitled to a trial free from bitterness and personal abuse; he was entitled to gentlemanly treatment for himself and his counsel, and the public had a right to expect that those acting for the church and for the cause of Christ should bear themselvs with dignity and be free from malice. But the record of the case, especially the speech of the chief prosecuter, Dr. Hatfield, is filled with coarse abuse, low slang, and vindictivness. Dr. Hatfield would seem to hav formed his style from a police court model and to hav gathered his language from the slums. His speech is hardly fit to be published in a respectable newspaper. We can only ask what sort of men the Conference Committee was composed of that they could sit and hear such expressions without uttering a protest. The reporters speak of Hatfield's closing address as 'bitter, full of vulgar anecdotes and commonplace slang,' and 'unsparing in denunciation,' not only of the defendant, but also of his counsel. They also say that his 'hearers seemed to enjoy his coarseness, and the nearer he approached the indecent the more hearty were the demonstrations of approval.' Dr. Hatfield referred in coarse and contemptuous language to Dr. Thomas's 'forgetfulness' and to his feats of jugglery, and describing the abode of the lost as the defendant would hav it, demanded as though he were speaking to a crowd of pot-house politicians, 'How is that for hell?' At another point in his argument he asked the opposing counsel to 'put that in your pipe and smoke it.' He spoke of a church which Thomas had served as 'blasted, scaled, peeled, and blazed' when he (Hatfield) was appointed its pastor. Thomas was a 'traitor who skulked and meanly stabbed his mother church;' he 'dispensed with the gospel;' he was 'wily as old Talleyrand;' he was the cause of suicides in Chicago; he was a 'bastard Methodist,' while he (the speaker) had been converted at 'brimstone corner.' The court seemed to enjoy this harang, and its members spoke freely of the man and brother upon whom they sat in judgment as 'a dead cock in the pit,' 'a dead dog,' and avowed the intention of 'kicking out the heretic,' expressions which would be in place at a prize-fight. Men of the world are not to be blamed if they recoil with disgust from such an exhibition of Christian love and gentleness."

THE San Francisco Argonaut says: "We think the papal power, as embodied in the Roman Catholic church in this country, is dangerous, because we think it interferes, as a church organization, with the administration of our civil affairs. We believe that political teachings from the Pope of Rome are passed down through Roman priests and pulpits, till they control the political conduct of the more ignorant and bigoted of the believers in papal infallibility and the Pope's rightful claim to the civil dominion of the world. Knowing, as we do, that the Pope claims to be the vicegerent of God on earth, and his infallible representativ; claiming, as we know he has always claimed, to be entitled to the allegiance of all in civil authority as well as in spiritual, we think the citizen is not a good Catholic who does not squarely subscribe to the doctrin that the Pope, as his spiritual guide and head of the infallible church, is entitled to a higher allegiance than is due to the laws and magistracy of the country. No other position than this is logical, and we distrust either the intelligence or the sincerity of any man who takes any other position. The 'intelligent' Catholic who undertakes to dispute the fact as we hav here stated it, ignores the last twelve centuries of European history; ignores all that sacred and profane history has written of the assumption of papal supremacy; ignores half the bloody sacrifices of European battle-fields, half the diplomatic intrigues of courts, and all of the history of England, France, Spain, and Italy, where cardinals and legatees from Rome were placed as premiers with kings. There is not an American schoolgirl, outside of a nunnery, nor an American boy, outside of a monkery, who does not recall the story of papal intrigue and papal interference with all the governments of Europe. We recognize the necessity of American societies, because we fear—because we know—that the church of Rome and the Society of Jesus are plotting against republican government in America. They are endeavoring to undermine our educational system, and in its place they would giv us the education of priests, and control our politics under the disciplin of the confessional. They would declare all existing marriage relations, not celebrated by the priest after confession and between believers in the dogmas of the Roman faith, as adulterers; all children not born within the altar ceremonies of the Roman church, as illegitimate. They would establish for us a state religion, endow their churches from the public treasury, and support them by public tax. They would foist, as in Europe, their long-gowned and snuff-taking pensioners upon the toiling and industrious of our land; and when, in time, they had rooted out the ecclesiastical system, and on its ruins built their own structure of religious faith, they would, as in Rome only fifteen years ago, drive our churches out of existence, and make the worship of God impossible by the prohibition of any other form than that of the papal church of Rome. They would, if they dared, re-enact the horrors of the middle ages to root out heresy from this American land. The immediate steps in this direction would be to giv us Pope's-Irish school directors, Pope's-Irish schoolmasters, Pope's Irish for our police, and Popes Irish in our Legislature."

News of the Week.

RAIN has come at last, after a long and severe drouth, but more is needed.

FOUR hundred girls, employed as strippers in the tobacco factory of P. Lorillard, in Jersey City, were on a strike last week because their foreman was discharged and a new man put in his place. They hav now resumed work.

LAND League arrests still continue in Ireland. Dublin is under martial rule. Parnell has issued a manifesto to the Irish tenantry to pay no more rent. The English government has declared Land League meetings against the law, and participants subject to arrest.

THE Rev. Dr. Burns, principal of the Wesleyan Female College, at Hamilton, Ontario, has written a letter sustaining and expressing sympathy with the Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, lately expelled from the M. E. church for heresy. Proceedings will be instituted against Dr. Burns.

CHAPTER XXXI.

I arrived before the gate. Violently I made my way through the crowd of people, which had streamed together in countless numbers, and was standing there gaping, burning with curiosity, and with shudders and joy and expectation, shoulder to shoulder.

Cold with horror I saw rising above the heads of the crowd the shining bayonets of the dragoons, which in threefold lines had surrounded the mill of my beloved uncle. Elevated above all, upon his horse, surrounded by a few distinguished gentlemen, I saw the Marshal de Montreval. He appeared serious and meditating.

"Most gracious lord!" I cried, when I had reached him.

He turned about, looked at me, and while he pointed with his crutch-cane to the mill, he said, without changing a feature: "The wretches! Now they are caught!"

"What do you intend to do, most gracious lord?" asked I.

"About that I hav meditated," he replied, "this quarter of an hour."

"O most gracious lord!" cried I, "surely, these miserable people hav offended against the law; but truly, they are more objects of your contempt than of your anger. Be merciful, gracious lord, and these erring ones will sink quietly at your feet, and never again——"

"What?" the marshal interrupted me. "These people are inconvertible. Rebels they are—mad, daring rebels. Shall I suffer this damned weed to grow, until it can produce another Michaelade?"*

"No, most gracious lord," said I, and seized entreatingly the hand of the Marshal which hung at his side. "You are altogether too just to avenge on those unfortunate ones yonder a cruel deed that happened nearly a century and a half ago."

"It is time to set a severe example," said the marshal, who hitherto had been undecided. He withdrew his hand, rode a few paces ahead, without minding me, and cried with loud voice, "Set the mill on fire!"

Half senseless, I staggered after him. I seized the bridle of his horse and cried, "For God's sake, mercy! mercy!"

"Away there," exclaimed he, and threw a wrathful look at me, and swung his stick, as if he wanted to strike me. I let the horse go, and fell down on my knees before the ice-cold Satan, and cried, "Mercy!"

I heard the rustling and crackling of the flames, and saw the thick clouds of smoke rolling over the roof of the mill, and heard the dull, heart-rending cries of the imprisoned ones. I sprang to my feet again, and embraced the marshal's knees. God knows what I cried to him, what I begged of him in my anxiety. But he listened not to me; he had no human feeling. The pious tiger looked only upon the burning mill.

And soon my senses began to vanish under the wild tumult around about, and under the pitiable cries of those dedicated to death, and under the thunder of the guns. Those who attempted to escape the flames were shot down by the dragoons.

Then I aroused myself, and rushed toward the mill. In the same moment a girl threw herself out of the window. I caught her. It was Antonia, my uncle's youngest daughter.

"Thou art saved, Antonia," said I, and carried the poor creature through smoke and gun-firing away, and came, without knowing it, to the marshal.

"The dog!" cried the marshal. "I hav always said it, that he was one of them!" I was not aware that he spoke of me.

"Down!" he roared again. Two dragoons tore the fainting Antonia out of my arms, and while she lay upon the ground these inhuman beasts shot the innocent creature at my feet.

"Right so to the God-forgotten heretics!" said the marshal quite calmly behind me.

"O thou contemptible monster! How wilt thou justify this deed before thy king and our king, and before thy God and our God?" I screamed at him in rage.

He started toward me, gave me a blow with his cane over the head, and rode over me. I believed in the confusion he had given orders to kill me. I gathered myself up, tore the gun from the hand of one of the dragoons, in order to defend my life. No one dared to touch me, notwithstanding the marshal cried several times in succession: "Take him! Take him!"

While I looked wildly about me, I saw—oh, the horrible sight!—over the dead body of Antonia, my uncle, Mr. Etienne, with bleeding head. I could recognize him only by his form and his clothes. He raised an agoninizing cry toward heaven and sank down under gunshots upon the corpse of his beloved child.

I wanted to speak to the marshal. But my tongue was petrified! I only raised the eyes and the hand with the gun toward heaven. Then I felt a blow and sank down in dull insensibility.

Until then I had preserved my faith in humanity. Until then I had blindly given myself up to it. Nourished only by the masterpieces of the greatest minds of our time, had I lulled myself into happy delusions. I had believed humanity by far more human, and freed from the bonds of wild barbarism. Was I not a subject of the most praised monarch in the world? France called the reign of Louis XIV. her golden age! Alas! and Montreval was a governor under Louis, and Palm-Sunday of the year 1703 a Sunday of the golden era! About two hundred people on this day were burned alive, or shot, and even the babe was not spared on its mother's breast! And all the property of the murdered ones was confiscated—and Montreval's cruelty by a royal hand covered with praises!

CHAPTER XXXII.

When I had recovered to clear perception of my surroundings I found myself under the hands of strangers and my wounded head was bandaged. Now and then during my insensibility I had, it is true, indistinctly felt that some one was busy about me and that I suffered pain, but quickly extinguished again was the perception, and I lost myself again in darkness, as if in a heavy sleep.

"Thou hast, my faith, thou hast a tough life, thou!" these were the first words I heard again. An old, dirty fellow stood before me and handed me medicin.

I did not see Clementine. In a small cell I lay, upon a hard, coarse bed.

"Where then am I?" said I.

"Art with me," said the fellow. Now for the first time I again remembered the unfortunate event to which I owed, to all appearance, my presence here.

"Am I then a prisoner?"

"To be sure, and that by right," answered my keeper.

"Does Madame de Sonnes know of this? Has she not sent here? Can I not speak to her?"

"Dost thou know people here? Where does she liv?"

"In Martin's street, in the house of Albertas."

"Fool thou! In all Marseilles is no Martin's street. Thou hast fever still, I believe, or dost thou not know thou art in Marseilles?"

"In Marseilles? How in Marseilles am I? Am I away from Nismes? How long hav I been here?"

"It may be three weeks, thou poor devil. I well believe that thou knowest nothing about it. Until last night thou hast raged in hot fever. Must hav a good constitution. We thought to bury thee today."

"What shall I do here in Marseilles?"

"When thou art well thou wilt put on that jacket there. Dost thou know it?"

"That is a galley-jacket. How then? Tell me, am I——? I will, I cannot believe——. Am I condemned?"

"Probably, as they say, for only twenty-nine years on the rowing-bench."

The fellow spoke too true. As soon as I had recovered, the terrible sentence was made known to me. On account of threats and assaults upon the life of Marshal de Montreval, not counted; that I was proven to be a secret Protestant, and in behalf of the heretics in the chancery; and where I, on account of my office, had influence, had committed many embezzlements, I had been condemned to serve twenty-nine years on the galleys.

I sighed, but in the consciousness of my innocence I, without pain, put on the slave-jacket. My tears flowed only for the fate of Clementine. I endeavored to send a few lines to her. With a borrowed pencil, upon a torn piece of paper, I wrote my farewell. Alas, I was too poor to bribe my keeper. He took my letter, read it, and tore it, laughing, into pieces, while he said, "Here is no post-office for love-letters."

They put the chain on me, and led me, beside other companions of misery, down to the harbor and upon the galley destined for us. It was a beautiful evening. The city displayed its magnificence in the splendor of the setting sun. Out of the dark green of the mountain sides, which embraced the harbor crowded with ships of all nations, shone snow-white the numberless villas, and between the almond and olive trees of the Bastides fluttered with all colors of the rainbow the thousand silken streamers. Through the mouth of the harbor the sight lost itself in the unlimited area of the ocean.

The splendor of this panorama dazzled me and filled me with unspeakable melancholy. The shores of my fatherland seemed only to display their whole splendor in order to make me feel the more intensely what I had lost. All about me breathed joy, only I was forever joyless, and I only saw the limits of my misery on the brink of a distant grave.

Sleepless the night passed. Early in the morning the galley left the harbor. When the sun rose above the inflamed waves, Marseilles had vanished from my sight. I was chained to a rowing-bench, upon which five more slaves were fastened.

CHAPTER IX.

THE PROPHETS.

The words prophet, Nabi, Roëh, speaking, seeing, divining, are the same. All ancient authors agree that the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and all the Asiatic nations had their prophets and soothsayers. Those people exisced long before the Jews, who, as a petty crowd occupying a small corner of the earth, had no other language than that of their neighbors. We hav said elsewhere that they borrowed from the Phœnicians the names God, Elah, Jehovah, and Adonijah, and that they obtained all their rites and customs from the people who surrounded them, notwithstanding they were always speaking unfavorably of those very same people.

Some one has said that the first prophet or soothsayer was the first knave who found a fool to believe, in which case the prophet is the most ancient personage. But in this supposition fraud is added to fanatical blindness, which indeed exist simultaneously in the human brain. We hav seen crowds of prophets, like those mentioned by the Jews, arrive in London from the land of Languedoc and from Vivarais, who were imbued with the greatest enthusiasm joined with the most disgusting illusions. We hav seen Jurien * prophesy in Holland. There hav been such impostors in all times—not only the scoundrels who made the predictions, but other scoundrels who believe the predictions made by the older set.

The world has been filled with sibyls and Nostradamuses. The Koran reckons the number of prophets to be two hundred and twenty-four thousand. Bishop Epiphanus, in his notes upon the false canon of the apostles, enumerates sixty-three Jewish prophets and ten prophetesses. The trade of prophesying had neither dignity nor rank among the Jews. It was not even a state profession. They never received a prophet as we receive a doctor of Oxford or Cambridge. They prophesied as they wished. It was sufficient to hav or to believe and pretend to hav, the calling and spirit of God. They revealed the future by dancing and playing upon a harp. Saul, reprobate as he was, took good care to become a prophet. Each conflicting party in a civil war had their prophets, just as we hav our reporters from Grub street.† The two parties called each other fools, schemers, liars, and rogues, and in speaking thus they spoke the truth. Scitote, Israël, stultum prophetam, insanum virum spiritualem—"Know ye, Israel, the prophet is a fool; the spiritual man is mad," said Hosea, according to the Vulgate. "The prophets of Jerusalem are light and treacherous persons," said Zephaniah, a prophet of Jerusalem (Zeph. iii, 4). They are all like the apothecary who advertises, "Take my pills to prevent accidents."

The prophet Micaiah predicted the misfortunes of Samaria and of Judah. The prophet Zedekiah staggered him with a blow in saying, "How can the spirit of God pass by me to go to you?" (1 Kings xxii, 24.)

Jeremiah, who made his prophecies in favor of Nebuchadnezzar, a tyrant, put cords on his neck, and a yoke on his back, as an example. He then sent this badge to the petty neighboring kings as an invitation to submit themselvs to Nebuchadnezzar. The prophet Hananiah, who regarded Jeremiah as a traitor, seized his bonds, broke them, and cast his yoke upon the earth.

There is Hosea, whom God ordered to take a prostitute for a wife, and hav children of prostitutes—Vade, sume tibi uxorem fornicationum et fac tibi filios fornicationum (Hosea i, 2), says the Vulgate. Hosea obeyed implicitly. He took Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim, who bore him three children. So that prophecy and that fornication lasted nearly three years. But that was not sufficient for the God of the Jews. He directed Hosea (Hosea iii) to lie with a woman who had already put horns upon her husband's head. It only cost the prophet fifteen drachmas and one and a half measures of barley. That was a dear bargain with an adulterer.‡ It cost the patriarch Judah less than that to commit incest with his daughter-in-law Tamar.

* A Protestant pastor and persecutor of the philosopher Bayle.

† Grub street is where the wretched pamphlets, the inception of London journalism, were published [1767].

‡ Notice how the prophet choses the proper word "fodio cam," "defile her." Oh, abomination! Yet these wretched books are put in the hands of children, and seducers train their young victims in the convents.

There is Ezekiel, who, after receiving an order from God to sleep three hundred and ninety days upon his left side, and forty days upon the right side, swallowed a parchment book and ate fœces* upon his bread, and introduced God himself, the creator of the world, as speaking thus to the young Aholah: "Thou has become great, thy breasts hav been pressed, thou has shown thy thighs to all who were passing. . . . Thy sister Aholibah was more corrupt in her inordinate love (Ezek. xxiii, 20). She doted upon paramours whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue is like the issue of horses."

Our friend, General Withers, to whom we one day read these prophecies, asked which one of the w—— made the scriptures sacred.

A person rarely reads the prophecies. It is difficult to read for any length of time so much balderdash. The men of the world who hav read Gulliver and Atlantis neither know nor hav read Hosea or Ezekiel.

Persons who were made to see the folly of these horrible passages, seemed never to recover from their astonishment. They cannot conceive why Isaiah marched naked into the midst of Jerusalem, why Ezekiel cut his beard into three parts, or how Jonah could liv three days in the belly of a whale. If any one were to read such extravaganzas and such improper tales in a book which we call profane, he would cast such a book away with horror. When we say such is the Bible, the people are confounded, they hesitate, they condemn the abominations, but dare not condemn the book which contains them. But this happens so long as they fail to use common sense. They finally end by detesting that which the rogues and fools hav made them worship.

When were these books, without reason and without modesty, written? No one knows. The most probable opinion is that the majority of the books attributed to Solomon, Daniel, and others were manufactured in Alexandria, but that does not matter; are they still of one faith, time, and place? Is it not sufficient to see from the evidence that they are monuments of an extravagant and infamous folly?

How could the Jews hav venerated these books? It is because they were Jews. It is necessary to remember that these monuments of exaggeration did not confine war only to the priests and scribes. We know very well that books were scarce where printing, invented by the Chinese, was only lately discovered. We are still more astonished when we see that the fathers of the church accepted these disgusting chimeras, or quoted them in proof of their propositions.

From the ancient Testament we pass on to the New. We come at last to Jesus and the establishment of Christianity; and in order to get there we are obliged to wade through the assassination of many kings, the destruction of many children, either cast in the flames in the valley of Topheth, or crushed by the torrents flowing over the rocks. Let us pass by that frightful scene, and let us not interrupt the horrors by any sacrilege. Miserable Jews! It is among you that a man from the dregs of the people is born who bore the very common name Jesus! Let us see who this Jesus was.

* What madness from Bedlam! God order, by his own mouth, a prophet to devour filth while lying on his left side for three hundred and ninety days. Can we imagin any more disgusting horror? Can we believe this of a people who hav calculated gravitation and the aberration of the light of fixed stars? [1776.]

Liberty, Science, and Humanity.

The Harmony and Meaning of the Scientific Gospels.

TWO LECTURES DELIVERED BEFORE THE N. Y. LIBERAL CLUB

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

LECTURE I.

THE OBJECTIVE ORDER.—CONTINUED.

The next, the third great harmony of science, we may call:

III—THE LAW OF THE THREE STATES, OR DEANTHROPOMORPHIZATION.

The great astronomical change from an illusory Universe to the true Cosmos and the Infinite necessitated this great advance in human thought. We may call it the process of "deanthropomorphization" of the Cosmos and of the Infinite. That is, the ceasing to regard and to act toward the external world as if it were a collection of human beings. That this process has been a constant attendant of the progress of mankind, our scientists and philosophers concur with all unbiased travelers and historians in affirming. Hume pointed out this process or law in his "Essays on Natural Religion," and Turgot, Comte, Spencer, Tylor, Fiske, and others show their originality by a slightly varying statement of what amounts to the same general law of this side of human progress, though each philosopher is clamorous for a patent or a new name for any slight improvement of his own.

If, as Lucretius taught, the great utility of science was not its material benefits, great as they are, but rather its power to cleanse the minds of men from the "taint of theology," nothing can be more profitable or desirable than a clear understanding of this process of anthropomorphizing and deanthropomorphizing. For these long words we are indebted to Spencer and Fiske. They are simply English letters for the Greek words anthropos, a man, and morphos, a form.

Readers of Comte will remember the great stress he lays upon this process and the order in which he supposes that its three main stages theoretically occur. He makes it his principal law of social development and progress, because each stage necessitates the next in the following order:*

(1) In the first stage, the human savage began to form some notion or rude philosophy of the world about him. The scientific or correlative antecedents —i. e., the true causes of the motions of objects— could not be known to the savage. What he did seem to know was that his own motions were the result of his own will—to him an immaterial, imperceptible power. That will seemed to him separate from his body, for there were shadows and dreams, and spirit, or "breath," as the word originally means in most languages, which proved to him that they moved independently and were quite distinct from his body. Wills and spirits similar to his own he therefore inferred to exist and to be the causes of the changes in the things about him.

In this way man peopled the world with spirits, devils, fairies, and gods. He explained every thing, especially every wonderful thing, on this will hypothesis. To him the world was, therefore, anthropomorphized. Comte, taking the worship of the negroes as the type of this belief, calls it Fetichism, after the corruption of the Latin factitiosus, or as we say, fictitious, applied by the Portuguese to the negro superstitions. Mr. E. Tylor describes this state of mind as Animism (from the Latin anima, a soul). The theory being that souls or spirits (from the Latin spiritus, breath) were the causes of the changes in the world. You are earnestly recommend to read the whole history of this process in Mr. Spencer's "Sociology."

(2) The next stage Comte theoretically describes as Polytheism. It arose from the fact that man began to outgrow his will or spirit-philosophy, and ceased to regard it as the explanation of the more ordinary things and events, wherein order and law were observed, which gradually took the place of the wills or spirits. Thus as to such objects he adopted science in its empirical and rudimentary phases. But the wills were condensed as they were outgrown. The greater gods were still believed to dominate the objects from which the smaller wills had disappeared. Instead of the spirit or god for every object, we find Brahma, Jove, or Odin. This process of condensation continued as the thoughts of men widened. The conception of law and order as to all familiar things drove these higher gods to the control of the more remote, inexplicable, and terrible phenomena—to the sea, storms, mountains—the sky, the sun, moon, and stars. It was then in astrolatry or star-worship, that is, when polytheism had its principal base upon the stars, that it appeared in its most glorious forms, and gave mankind order, civilization, art, and empire. The names of the days of our week are those of the seven planetary deities that once ruled the planets, including the sun and moon. They are the very names of the gods of Greece and Rome translated into their Scandinavian counterparts. Thus time and order came to us from the stars.

(3) The next and third inevitable step in this process was Monotheism. For ancient astronomy revealed the order and laws of the heavenly bodies and combined them all into one rotating universe, as we have above described. The universe, as soon as it became considered as one—as a moving, limited unity—must, as we have shown, have a Supreme Will or God exterior to it, as its Creator, Mover, and Governor, to whom it and all other gods and men must be subject as the highest power of all.

All of the gods were therefore condensed into or made subject to this one supreme will, "whose habitation was eternity," or "the infinity" outside of the revolving universe. That universe had of course been created by him out of nothing or out of himself. Thus the ancient faiths, or animistic explanations as Mr. Tylor calls them, passed from the common fetich up to the Infinite, and are there simply summed up in Monotheism, whereby all are deanthropomorphized but the Infinite One. What warrant for this last stage there was or may be we shall hereafter consider further.

(4.) With Polytheism, and still more with Monotheism, arose a new state of mind, called by Comte the Abstract or Metaphysical. According to that belief some abstract quality existed in objects or in the world as the cause of their changes, and which could take the place of the older or theological conception of personal wills. The metaphysical goddess "Nature" took subordinate charge of the Cosmos, that is the known or knowable world, as she had done for the polytheistic deities, and with her aid the monotheistic system was gradually modified by the Mohammedan and Christian philosophers of the middle ages.

Metaphysics finally permeated and honey-combed theology, and rendered it to the more intelligent of its followers an allegory of pantheistic naturalism, which still remains to a great extent the prevailing creed. But as each poetic believer chooses his own qualities and causes, it is individualistic in its tendency, and not social, nor religious, nor organic. Metaphysics may fill our libaaries, but it has never founded a separate church or polity. It verifies ideas by ideas and fancies, and not as science does by things, facts, processes, and laws.

(5.) The next and final stage of this dehumanizing process is called the Scientific or Positive. In this stage facts and laws take the place of the fictions of theology and the abstractions of metaphysics. Its very soul and substance may be called certainty*ism* or Positivism. It is in its nature social, that is, in the true sense, religious and organic. Its firm foundation was laid, as we have shown, when the Copernican system was established. It is the counterpart of the inevitable deanthropomorphization of the Cosmos and of the Infinite. It must, when coördinated into a body of knowledge, form a positive philosophy, which will give the known truth about the world, and then it will take the place of theology, which was our old and fictitious explanation of the same world. It will thus become in its very substance and nature the basis of man's religion.

The reason why there has been and can be no reconciliation between science and theology is now manifest. They are two different and opposite theories for explaining the same world, and only one of them can be true. When, therefore, men began to ask, Can this stable heaven and its infinity of space be a person? everything was at stake. A glance only was needed to make this clear, for all there was of monotheistic theology in doctrine and government was seen to be but a deduction of the old cosmogony to us known to be condensed fetichism, resting upon and resulting from this illusory astronomy of our ancestors. There is hardly need to even suggest much further than we have already done the details of this deduction. They form the contents of all works of theology.

In them the Infinite Fetich God appears as an immense but indefinable anthropoidal person existing in some indescribable way outside of, or independent of the "universe." This anthropoidal governor of his created universe is represented as acting from human motives of self-interest, for his own good and glory.

To know the will of this omnipotent Anthropoid was the purpose of theology, as the name implies, (Theos, God, and Logos, word). Indeed, Theology, under that theory of the world, was the only true and fundamental learning—the only knowledge really worth having. For all of the changes of the world, nay, the end of the world—for end it might have if it had been created—depended upon the will of this extra-mundane being.

The government of this created universe, by its Pantarch, was administered on the purely tribal principles of an eastern patriarch, from whom he had been modeled. Thence came the eastern "chosen tribes" with a special revelation. Thence a sacrificed son, with especial care of those for whom he was specially selected. Thence finally his specially-appointed vicars and dynasty of popes on earth to watch over and save his redeemed, and on the consequent absurdities and cruelties. To reconcile this Monotheism with the unavoidable idea of the Infinite it was necessary not to think but only to believe, or to pretend to believe; i. e., to have "faith." The more impossible and absurd the creed, the greater became the merit of this Faith. That three gods were one and one three; that the Father was the same as the Son, born of his own begetting, upon his own mother, were simple matters to faith, whose method (as Tertullian, the first Christian father, announced it) was, "I believe because it is impossible." The greater the mystery, the greater the faith; and greater absurdities were constantly conceived in order to highten the saving grace of pretending to believe what no one could know. The holy authority embodied in a holy church, a holy Bible, a holy Inquisition, was simply the authority of the personified Infinite. It struck down all human reason at a blow. Civilization, law, literature, fell before it. Monotheism, Christian and Mohammedan, the most bloody and cruel of all religions, devastated Europe and the fairest parts of Asia and Africa with wars,

* Mr. Spencer has sought, as usual, to work up a difference between himself and Comte in stating this familiar process or law. As in many other cases between him and Comte, the difference amounts to this: Comte, looking at human progress objectively and historically, describes it theoretically in three states or phases, like geologic strata, not necessarily in all cases, or even in fact, occurring as completed or regular. Spencer, looking at it on the subjectiv or logical side, sees that this process is on that side continuous and the same, appearing to differ only in its application to different objects. This givs us the inner and outer side of the same process, the general growth of the human soul, but there is no material difference. Comte gives the law from the historical, Spencer from the psychological, point of view.

persecutions, tortures, murders, and miseries unspeakable and almost incredible.

Yet back of all these horrors lay that fundamental illusion and mistake in astronomy—that the world was a revolving "universe" with an outside. When Bruno would lecture and publish upon the "Stability of the Heavens" and the "Infinity of Worlds," the church had no alternative but to crush him or die. She knew that the crisis in her history had come.

Dr. John W. Draper, in his "Conflict between Religion [Theology] and Science," has proposed that some day the scientific world should unite in placing the statue of Bruno beneath the dome of St. Peters, reconsecrated to man. That this should be done may not hereafter appear more strange than that the Parliament of Italy, united and emancipated from papal rule, should now be sitting in Rome. Already the students of Italy have a statue of Bruno in the Eternal City.

But would it not be a surer and a nobler monument than any "enduring bronze" could ever be to date, the Calendar of the New Era of Science and Man from the year 1600 as its year one. Thus the Martyr's death would consecrate the birth of the new order and life of man in his new heaven and earth. Comte has proposed that this new era should run from 1789, the date of the French Revolution, as the greatest social and political event of our modern revolutions and progress. Many other dates of great events have been suggested. Americans are partial to their own national birth-year, 1776, as the beginning of a new political order, and the antithet of 776 B.C., the first recorded Olympiad, and so the first certain date of European civilization. Still back of all these modern revolutions and steps of progress, as the cause of them all, stand the great world-opening discoveries of 1600, and with them nothing reaches us more striking than the voice and blood of Bruno proclaiming the infinity of worlds, and the stability of the heavens!

The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

During the past week we hav mailed to those who had ordered it the above work. There hav been innumerable vexatious delays in its preparation, but orders will now be filled on the day of their reception. To those of our readers who hav perused the book as it was printed in these columns it is not necessary to say that it is a very valuable work for reference and interesting to peruse. It has been said by many that Mr. Mair was the ablest upholder of Christianity they ever read, and it is safe to say that whatever arguments could be adduced in favor of Christianity were brought forward by the gentleman. But falsehood, however ably upheld, cannot stand where the truth is known; and Mr. Bennett has shown this most clearly. Under his sledgehammer blows the theology of Mr. Mair crumbles to dust. He has a very effectiv way of putting his arguments, and he never leaves a point in doubt, but piles proof on proof, mountain high, until the enemy is completely overwhelmed in a mass of evidence. This book is a thorough examination of the Christian system of religion, divided into the folloing theses:

1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion. (a) The belief in an offspring being begotten by a god upon a human virgin is nearly a thousand years older than the mythical story of Jesus and his virgin mother. (b) Other so-called saviors and redeemers hav been believed in and reported to hav been crucified and to hav died on the cross many hundreds of years before the same was said of Jesus. (c) There is not a dogma, rite, sacrament, or ceremony in Christianity that did not exist in pagan systems from five hundred to two thousand years before Christianity was known in the world.

2. Miracles, and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

4. The teachings of Jesus are defectiv in morals, intelligence, and scientific information, and, so far as they are of value, his moral precepts and teachings were equaled by many sages and teachers who preceded him. The Bible itself was written by men illy informed in scientific knowledge, and does not harmonize with the facts and principles in nature known to be true.

5. The doctrins and claims of Christianity hav been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love, it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed. It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world. It recognizes and supports the obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God. As a proof of this the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church hav been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

6. The Bible and Christianity hav oppressed woman and hav deprived her of the rights to which by nature she is justly entitled.

7. The Bible and Christianity are unprogresiv in their nature. They are founded upon the doctrin and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement.

8. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the highest class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving.

Mr. Bennett affirms all these propositions—we had almost said truisms—and Mr. Mair denies with what power he can. He brings to the defense of Christianity the best arguments that can be adduced. His letters show painstaking care and a familiarity with authors unexcelled by any layman. Indeed, few professional theologians could draw from the arsenal of the church better weapons. But he is met at every point and disarmed with a promptness that shows Mr. Bennett to be more than his match, and no less familiar with authors. Mr. Mair knows only one side, while Mr. Bennett knows both, and he has not failed to show that Christianity is weak and indefensible, founded on assumptions, supplemented by deceit, and extremely weak in the essentials of proof.

This work will do a great amount of good wherever read. All who hav read it in the paper will want it in book form to preserve, while for the new subscriber it will possess the added charm of newness. 969 pages; price, $1.50.

Comstock Crawls.

Comstock has long borne the appellation of "the Sneak," and he has again vindicated his right to bear the name. Since his arrest by Mr. Wilson he has sent his lawyer to him to urge him to withdraw the suit. When Mr. Wilson published him in the Brooklyn papers as a liar and scoundrel he went to him again, whining that it was cruel to tell this "right in Brooklyn." When, after several weeks had elapsed since his arrest, Comstock was again hauled up before Judge Smith he began a series of demurrings that will prolong his case indefinitly. He knows that he is guilty of a gross libel, but naturally he wants to keep out of prison as long as he can. Instead of bringing the persons who he said had written to him about the Wilsonia garments he went into court and tried to squelch the proceedings by saying that the letter was not a libel. Now the question of what constitutes a libel has got to be argued, which makes it a case of Comstock vs. the people. If calling an honest man an outrageous swindler is not libel then our language needs revision. Mr. Wilson had so many friends in court ready to testify to the merits of his garments that a special court had to be ordered for the case. But Comstock could not bring a solitary witness on his side. Probably he never got a letter, but manufactured his libelous circular out of whole cloth. Mr. Wilson publicly offers to giv him $5,000 if he will bring one person who has worn his goods as he directs that did not receive benefit therefrom.

It is a question now for the courts and citizens of this state to determin how much longer this nefarious man shall be allowed to attack everybody he chooses to, or can be induced to by others, and subject them to great expense. He is a fungous growth upon our statute laws, a result of corrupt politics. Within the church militant, he carries on a guerrilla warfare, which is a disgrace to our country. Every honest and patriotic man must be glad that in Mr. Wilson Comstock has met another man who will not be blackmailed or bribed.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD writes us to say that the notice of his "Essays and Lectures" which appeared in the Index was written without his knowledge, and that he never authorized the statement that Mr. Bennett published the book without his consent. This is as we supposed, although Mr. Underwood himself must acknowledge that it has a curious look, to say the least, that a paper of which he had but recently resigned the temporary editorship, and of which the next week he took permanent associate charge, should publish this notice. But we hasten to do Mr. Underwood justice. Now let the Index do Mr. Bennett justice.

IF any one of our readers has a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18th they do not want they will do Mr. J. E. Burton, of Geneva Lake, Wisconsin, a favor by sending it to him.

WE recently received a package of pamphlets from M. B. Craven, with the following note:

"PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 5, 1881.

"MR. EDITOR: I send you one hundred copies of my 'Angel of Horeb,' gratuitously, to assist Mr. Bennett in his journey around the world. Express paid. Respectfully,

"M. B. CRAVEN."

Our thanks are returned to Mr. Craven for his generous donation, and we shall be pleased to sell not only this hundred but many hundreds of his pamphlets. The "Angel of Horeb" is a critical review of biblical inspiration and divinity, and is written in Mr. Craven's usual clear and convincing manner. The price is 10 cents. We want to sell the whole hundred, so we can send friend Craven a copy of Mr. Bennett's travels, to the success of which he has contributed them.

THIS week Mr. Bennett begins the account of the International Freethinkers' Congress. It will be completed next week. Mr. Bennett left London the 6th, traveling across the continent for Trieste, which place he expected to reach by the 12th and leave by steamer on the 15th. As the mail is somewhat slower down that way, we hav not received word from him, but hav no doubt that he is energetically investigating all that he sees, and industriously putting it down on paper for the benefit of his friends.

WE would call attention to a new work we hav just issued, "Voltaire in Exile." It is an epitome of the life of the great Infidel, and for those who cannot afford the higher priced life, by James Parton, and yet want to know all about Voltaire, it is just the work. It was written by Benjamin Gastineau, of Paris, and translated for us with his approval by F. Vogeli and Edmond Dubourg. It contains an account of Voltaire's youth, his exile in England, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland, his relations with Jean Jacques Rousseau, Frederick the great, Catherine II., and Pope Benedict XIV.; what he did at Ferney, how he improved the town, built a church, fought the Jesuits, and defended the victims of religious hatred and persecution. It describes his triumphant return to Paris after his years of exile, and ends with chapters on his work, his philosophical system, his enemies, and some hitherto unpublished letters.

Many volumes hav been written upon Voltaire, but none of its size contains so much information as this. From it a clear idea can be obtained of the immense influence he exerted upon Europe and the world by his brilliant genius, and how the church has ever fought the men who dared to step out of the orthodox paths of thought.

We will fill orders as fast as they come, and hope to send off a good many. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents.

A New English Work.

THE STUDENT'S DARWIN. By Edward B. Aveling, D. Sc., fellow of University College, London. Freethought Publishing Company. Price, $1.50.

This is a careful review, analyzation, and epitomization of the works of the great scientist and philosopher, Charles Darwin, commencing with his first work, "The Naturalist's Voyage Round the World," embracing in chapters geological observations on volcanic islands and on parts of South America; on the structure and distribution of coral reefs. Botanical works.—Insectivorous plants; various plants examined; evolution of insect-eating plants; orchids of England and other countries; cross and self-fertilization in plants; means of fertilizations; sexes in flowers; forms of flowers in regard to sex; plants in which the sexes are separated; cleistogarnic flowers. On the movement of plants.—Circumnutation; nervous action. Next comes zoological work, taking up the discussion of different subjects. This is followed by Darwin's works on evolution. 1. "The Origin of Species," embracing the meaning of species; variation under domestication; artificial selection; variation under nature; natural selection; laws of variation; difficulties; arguments for natural selection, animals and plants under domestication. Conclusion is made by a thorough review of the "Descent of Man," embracing evidence of man's descent from some lower form; analogies; manner of development of man from some lower form; secondary characteristics in the animals lower than man; secondary characteristics of man; expression of the emotions; general principles; expression in animals and man; conclusion; making in all a work of 340 pages.

Perhaps there is no man living who has a more appreciativ opinion of the philosophical teachings, the scientific acumen, and correctness of views on the part of Mr. Darwin than has Dr. Aveling, and perhaps there is no one more capable of clearly setting forth the views of the great author he admires. In his introduction he speaks thus: "It is the purpose of this book, coming from one of the student class, to tell something of this man's work to those who hav neither time nor opportuninty to investigate fully themselves. The most usual summing up of his labors, his writings, his very life, is: 'Darwin? Oh, yes! says we come from apes!' This epitome of his words and deeds is as unjust as it is summary. Yet the large majority of even educated people hav no other idea than this connected with the name of Darwin. It is necessary, therefore, to insist upon the fact that, independently of his theories, the author of 'The Origin of Species' has done more for the extension of our knowledge than perhaps any other man living; that two of the most carefully elaborated biographical subjects hav been worked out by him; that in minuteness and accuracy of observation, as well as in evidence of generalization, Darwin stands first among the scientific men of England—I had almost written of the world. Especially is it necessary that more of us should know the true meaning of the word 'evolution.' In an age when, according to a distinguished authority, young ladies in gilded saloons 'prattle Atheism about protoplasm,' it is not wonderful that the word 'evolution' should be on many lips. But the word to the general only conmates the development of man from some lower form of animal. The principle of evolution involves much more than that. If only to show to some readers more clearly what it does involve, and to impress upon them the fact that man's origin is comparativly of secondary importance, it were well perhaps that those pages should be written. Especially, therefore, will it be my aim to state clearly the full meaning of the theory of evolution now almost universally accepted by scientific thinkers, the argument for and the arguments against that hypothesis. With no light conciousness of unworthiness, but with great longing to be of some service to the many, I would stand as intellectual middle man between one man and the many, as interpreter between the bulk of readers and one of the foremost men of his age."

After faithfully and clearly performing his work Dr. Aveling in his conclusion says: "My task is accomplished. It has been a pleasureable and an onerous one. Very pleasureable to hav had some hand, however feeble, in making the thoughts of a great thinker more readily known; very onerous, because there is a dread of having, perhaps, in some wise misrepresented him. It has been my desire to present his work to others in its true light. Here and there, I am aware that I hav pushed some of his conclusions further than perhaps he himself would be willing to believe they go, but I hav done so under a strict and stern sense of duty. Whilst he himself writes habitually as the purely scientific man I hav taken his facts and generalizations and looked at them in the light of Freethought. I believe that I hav been justified in doing so. Science, if I understand it rightly, is to be regarded as face to face, as antagonistic with the belief in the supernatural, and I hold it legitimate to take the teachings of our greatest, and push them to what seem to me their logical conclusions. Every great discovery in science of fact or of large general truth has been antagonistic to religious belief. I am not of those who believe that the business of the scientific man is simply to state scientific facts, and to be silent as to the inductions from them. Indeed, it is impossible to do so. The statement of the facts must lead to the making of the induction on the part of all that hear them, and it is best to state honestly along what lines and antagonistic to what views they work."

It is certainly most futil to undertake to hide the truth that facts and well-sustained opinions of Darwin inevitably destroy every vestige of the doctrin of supernaturalism, and it is far better to look this matter squarely in the face than to try to keep it covered from the observation of men. Those who wish a clear uuderstanding of what Darwin taught and what his views lead to should procure this work. Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. D. M. B.

Plagiarism and Falsehood.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: W. E. Coleman's restricted definition of plagiarism is too thin, and his defense evasiv and false. In my tract I prove that he plagiarized my "original ideas and language," and this, too, in the face of his prior false allegation that "there is not an original idea or fact in my work." He says he took from it only a small portion of a dozen quotations. I prove beyond all doubt that he borrowed from me all that he quoted or summarized from seventeen authors named; that every reference by him to those authors was taken from mine, and that he added nothing from their works not found in my pamphlet. Had I been permitted to answer his numerous falsehoods and calumnies in the Seymour Times the publication of my tract would hav been unnecessary. He first assailed me there indecently, and the point of my reply was, "Shame on W. E. Coleman for disparaging a writer from whom he has plagiarized." I was never disposed to magnify the plagiarism, but I felt constrained to expose the calumniator. He joined in the persecution of Mr. Bennett when in prison, and I, in a letter to D. M. Bennett, May 10, 1880, called W. E. Coleman "the cultured plagiarist." I hav at hand testimony to his habit of plagiarism.

Mr. Underwood's opinion of the completeness of W. E. Coleman's vindication was volunteered before my proofs of plagiarism were offered to the Seymour Times and meanly refused insertion. Mr. Underwood gave it while smarting under my exposure of his profound ignorance, numerous blunders, and subterfuges on the Paine-Junius question.

I continue to send my tract "Plagiarism" to all who apply for it. W. H. BURR.

Washington, D. C.

The Gospel of Smut.

The enemies of Freethought answer argument with abuse, and logic with slander. This was the case in Black's reply to Col. Ingersoll. Some of the religious papers confined their quotations to the personalities of Mr. Black, and commended them to their readers. Since that time some of the Bohemians of the church hav gone a step farther, and pretend to unmask Col. Ingersoll's private life. One of this class who is writing for the Cincinnati organ of the church to which President Garfield belonged complains that many of his own brethren receive his charges with credulity. Of course they do and must. They know that President Garfield counted Col. Ingersoll in the list of his intimate and trusted friends. This confidence and trust grew out of a knowledge of the manliness and purity of life of Ingersoll, and of an appreciation of his intellectual abilities. When the greatest mind and most brilliant scholar in their church placed such an estimate upon Ingersoll, the voice of the clerical tramp wastes its slander upon unheeding ears.

Infamous slander was the weapon used against Paine by Cheetham, and it has found an echo in the church circles ever since. They were ready to believe the worst of him, for the cardinal principle of their creed was the absolute wickedness of the whole race, except as saved through Christ. Believing that the whole race was devil-born, they grasped with eager clutches at every lie and libel that tended to prove it.

The world is wiser. Original sin and the supremacy of a personal devil hav ceased to be recognized as the foundation stones of religion. Out of the church they hav no influence. Science reigns supreme over superstition. Facts overwhelm scripture theories. Miracles and church fables melt away in the crucible of scientific investigation. Men are valued at their real worth. Intellectual ability, moral honesty, manly independence, are rated at their actual worth in the world, and are no longer weighed in the scales of bigotry.

This being the case, no coiner of slander nor retailer of clerical lies can succeed. Col. Ingersoll has no peer intellectually in this country. As an orator he is unsurpassed. In his profession he stands at the head. He has the confidence of the public, of the bar, and of the courts. It is unnecessary for his friends to hav any uneasiness about the attacks made upon his personal character, or his reputation as a lawyer and thinker. W. S. BUSH.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

More from London.—Concluded.

London, like New York and other American cities, is a center of the people of all nations. Twenty thousand French are said to be permanent residents here, with a due proportion of Dutch, Germans, Italians, Portuguese, with some from the oriental countries. I have seen comparatively few Chinese and Africans. Early one evening, Talmage-like, I walked with a friend in the eastern portion of the city to the old disreputable localities, next to the docks, where sailors and the lowest prostitutes most do congregate. I saw quite a number of hard-looking sailors of different nationalities, and the numerous places where they bought their spiritual consolation, which places in this locality are principally kept by foreigners; but it was too early in the evening for the frail sisters to be out in force, and as it is not safe for strangers to visit that quarter at night, we did not prolong our stay. I saw enough to remind one that there are great differences between the upper and the lower classes and the style in which they pass their lives. The kind providence who provides for all seems to make great distinction between the favored and the unfavored. It is hard to make him seem like a just and loving parent who does so well by some and so ill by hundreds of others. If he loves all alike, it seems singular that he treats them so unlike. The people of the West End must be greater favorites of his than those who live in the East End, for he takes very much better care of them.

While in the section alluded to I saw the tunnel under the Thames, which was constructed many years ago for general use by pedestrians and others, but which was not very well patronized, and was finally purchased by one of the underground railroads, and is now used only for the railroad. I saw enough of it to convince me that it is dark and gloomy.

I said a word about prostitutes. It is said there are forty thousand of them in this city. They are not all on the streets at night, but many thousands of them frequent railway stations and other localities where most likely to find customers. As a rule, they are bold and urgent in their requests, and not at all troubled with bashfulness. From appearances, they lead a wretched existence, and excite the deepest pity. For them, as society is organized, there seems no other hope save a short, miserable existence of crime and drunkenness, with an early, disgraceful death. I am quite sure that the kind providence who carefully watches over all his children is not very watchful and not very lavish with his favors toward this unfortunate class.

While the prostitutes of London are unhypocritical as to the lives they lead, I must say for the mass of the women of London that they are modest, discreet, and show as little wantonness and disposition to attract attention as any women in the world. While they tend shops of all kinds, and sell various wares also on the streets, while they evince independence and self-reliance, they are modest and ladylike as a rule. I cannot make it seem right to me that young ladies should tend bar-rooms, gin-mills, and rum-shops, but they do in this city, with hardly an exception. There are from ten to twenty-five thousand places in this city where intoxicating liquors are dispensed, and in nearly every one are from one to six beautiful young women. This practice may elevate the manners of the patrons of those establishments and cause them to conduct themselves with becoming propriety, but it is greatly to be feared that the morals and habits of the females are lowered in a corresponding degree. It very likely seems more pleasant to have a young lady pour out the wine, draw the ale, and decant the whisky and brandy, but I am sure if I had young daughters I would much prefer not to have them follow that avocation. And I am of the opinion that being served in that capacity by young women has a tendency to cause young men to visit those places more than they would otherwise. Some young men may be attracted by the presence of the opposite sex more than by the whisky bottle, but after going there they cannot do less than patronize the establishment.

The drinking habits of the English people are unquestionably a great evil. There is ten times as much drinking as there ought to be. There are some total abstinence people here, but they are the exception and not the rule. I should judge that nine-tenths of the people drink more or less, but more rather than less. The public bars and drinking places are patronized most extensively. I judge there is no retail business that has a livelier trade; and the worst of it is they are not patronized by men only. I have seen hundreds of women in and going in these places. I have seen half a dozen together standing by the bar quaffing ale and stronger drinks, and they were not prostitutes, but the wives of working men, and often appearing to move in good society. I have, on several occasions, seen women intoxicated on the street, and have had them stagger against me while walking along about my business. It is saddening that such a state of things exists among such an advanced and intelligent people as the English are. Good temperance organizations and effective temperance work is greatly needed here. If less of the labors of the Salvation Army and other street preachers abounded and more total abstinence advocates were doing efficient service, it would be far better. The rearing of children will have to be changed here. Their appetites for spirituous liquors will have to be discouraged. These things are not right as they are. I see women while traveling on railway trains take out their bottles and not only drink themselves, but give of the same to their children also. I have seen children from six to ten years of age at the dinner table have their wine glass filled the third and fourth time until they were unable to walk without staggering, and the parents seemed to think it all right. With such tuition and the formation of such early habits, it is not strange that the excessive indulgence in intoxicating drinks is the habit of adult life. There is far too much indulgence in the use of intoxicating liquors in America, but there is four times as much here in proportion to numbers. Many Father Mathews are needed to show the people the evil of this course.

I have visited four or five theaters here, but have not seen a fourth part of those in lively running condition. Comic opera and ballet plays have their full share of patronage. The performances I have witnessed were well done. In all the theaters I have visited fluid and other refreshments are carried around among the audience, and in nearly all cases by women. Sometimes they seem to do a very lively business, and it would seem that half the audience, women as well as men, partake of ale, wine, or something stronger. But with all this I have seen comparatively but little rioting, but little fighting and disorder. If the English people drink too much they seem to have the power not to go to outlandish extremes and make perfect demons of themselves. I sometimes think that the spirituous liquors of this country, being less fiery than the corn whisky of America, do not inflame the brain and make mad men so much as with us. But alcohol at best is alcohol, and it will take men's senses away and make them fools and desperadoes. Well will it be when people in all countries learn to do without alcoholic liquors. Will that time ever come?

The honor has been done me to invite me to dinner by many friends. In many cases I have gladly accepted these invitations, but in some cases, finding it inconvenient, I have been compelled to decline. The friends in London have uniformly been very kind to me. I shall feel under lasting obligations to Mr. Bradlaugh and his two amiable and talented daughters, Mrs. Besant, Dr. Aveling, Mr. Le Lubez, Mr. Forder, Mr. Smith, Mr. Dryden, Mr. Standring, and many others. They have taken me by the hand like a brother, and have shown me many kindnesses. May it be long before their shadows decrease.

I had a few minutes' intercourse with Mr. Charles Watts, who was about to leave for northern England and Scotland on a lecturing tour, and will probably not return before I leave the city. He seemed very friendly; he inquired after Prof. Rawson and other Americans, and sent his kind regards to the Liberals of America.

I have visited the Smithfield meat market, or rather three large market houses joined together by wide passage-ways. I think each section is over three hundred feet long and some two hundred and fifty wide. These are occupied for meats alone, save a small share of the space in one of them for butter and cheese. Through the center each way are wide avenues, and on either sides are narrow passages or streets, as they may be termed, and all the remainder of the space is taken up with hanging carcasses of beef, sheep, and hogs, with a fair share in one of the houses for dressed fowls. No meats are retailed here, but the sales are made to the meat dealers in all parts of the city. Around these extensive houses—with brick walls and large windows, iron posts and girders inside and iron and glass roofs—on all sides are meat-dealers' carts every week-day morning waiting for their supplies of flesh, and as fast as they obtain their loads others come to take their place, and thus the city is supplied with its daily stock of meat. It is indeed a sight to walk through these extensive houses and see the thousands upon thousands of carcasses of beef, sheep, and hogs hanging closely together with just space enough for buyers to pass in between the rows. The sides of beef are usually very large, stretching down from a hight of twelve feet, the necks coming to the stone floor, they hanging almost as compactly as possible. By walking through these immense houses one gets some idea of the amount of animal flesh it takes to feed London, and he very soon becomes impressed with the idea that the city is not exclusively vegetarian. The sales of meat of from a carcass to a dozen of them is brisk, and the dealers seem very anxious to sell. I was even taken for a buyer, and was asked by a dealer if he could not sell me half a dozen carcasses. I like a slice now and then, but did not wish to invest to that extent. I was informed that much American meat and cheese are sold here, and that that trade is growing pretty rapidly; though American meats and cheese do not command so large a price as the English. I was a little sorry to hear that. I would much prefer to hear that America always stands A1. The meat used by the Jews is not sold here. They have butchers of their own who still observe the injunctions of the old Mosaic law about the killing of animals. Their traffic in the flesh of beef and mutton is by no means small, while from pork they are absolute abstainers. I passed many of their butcher shops, I think on Aldgate street. They sell at both wholesale and retail, to gentiles as well as to Jews.

The fish market here is quite another establishment. Perhaps the largest fish-market in the world is the Billingsgate, near the Thames, which I described last year. The Londoners are great fish-eating people, and worlds of fish of many kinds are sold at Billingsgate. The business is conducted there in the new market house in a decorous manner, probably considerably unlike the style of fifty or a hundred years ago when the fish women of Billingsgate were noted or their coarse language.

While the subject of women is again partially under consideration, I wish to say a word about the women of London and of England. I think, as a rule, they have a healthier look than the women of America. Some are thin in flesh, but usually they are plump and well rounded out, and there is a freshness in their countenances that cannot pass unobserved. I see very few pale, cadaverous faces and none that look tawny or dingy. The women here have not such excessively red cheeks as the bonny lasses of Scotland and Ireland, but none of them have any necessity for rouge or face paint of any kind. And they are usually as erect as they are fair. They walk the streets with a peculiar head-crest style, and with an independent, self-reliant air.

I will also mention, as last year, that their dress patterns are scant in the waist, and the pullbacks are applied at so near the bottom of the dress as seemingly to interfere with easy walking. They attend to all kinds of business in the way of shop-keeping, selling goods out of doors, clerking in post-offices, etc. I think they show less timidity on the street than our ladies. They are out alone as late as midnight, and nobody thinks it strange any more than with men. They stop and talk together on the street late at night or at any time, the same as men do, and it attracts no attention.

I will say for the shop-keepers of London that they are a very expert class. They do up parcels, great and small, with neatness and remarkable celerity, especially the grocers and butter-dealers. I hav watched the butter-dealers, especially, with interest. They keep fresh and salted butter, of course of various grades, and when half-a-dozen customers are waiting at the counter for four or eight ounces of butter each, the dealer serves them very rapidly. He can guess closely the quantity wanted. With a little wooden paddle in each hand he cuts a lump from the firkin, puts it on the marble platform scale, gets the weight right, hits it a couple of taps and brings it to a square shape, lays it on a piece of paper, a pile of which lies by the scales, and wraps it neatly, and all within fifteen seconds. Many dealers do nothing but weigh out butter in this way from week's end to week's end, and it is not strange that they become experts. The grocers keep wrapped ahead nearly all kinds of goods like sugar, pepper, mustard, etc., done up in pound parcels, or by the penny's worth, and the neatness and uniformity of them is striking, as well as the rapidity with which the dealers serve their customers. London is a city of shop-keepers.

The mode of conveying freight and merchandise over the city is quite different from ours at home. I see no drays with two wheels, but numberless large heavy freight wagons with enormous loads piled upon them. The heavy draft-horses are large and strong. I think they are the Norman stock. We have but few such powerful horses. Like New York, this is a terribly hard place for horse-flesh. With smooth-worn shoes on the Belgian pavement, it is very hard for them to stand. I have seen them sliding along in descending grades like a boy on ice in new shoes. They often fall heavily. I have seen bus-horses, when at full speed, fall and be dragged a rod or more. If I were a horse I would not choose London or New York for my home. The composite asphalt and wooden pavement are used much more here than in New York, and this city is consequently very much stiller than New York. I can hardly understand why wood pavements should be more in use where wood is so much dearer. Many little ponies and donkeys in dog-carts are in use here, as they are all over Great Britain.

I will mention a system of fire ladders I have noticed, on wheels. A ladder is fixed firmly in an angle of say fifteen degrees from the perpendicular, perhaps twenty feet tall, with two other lengths capable of being pushed out somewhat like a telescope to a total hight of fifty feet. The ladder is run up against a burning building in which are people unable to escape. Those unable to descend upon the ladders are placed in a kind of case of wire network on the under side of the ladder, and in this they descend rapidly but safely, as at the foot there is an inclination in the opposite direction, which checks the speed. If it is not a delightful way of traveling, it is a good deal preferable to burning. These establishments are placed on the streets at nights, and with them is an inclosed car, for men and implements for the business. These are put out of the way in the morning.

The streets here are kept very clean. Hundreds of boys, called the "street orderly" are constantly employed at gathering up the horse-droppings, with a stiff brush and a box like a dust-pan in hand. It is amusing to see them dodging around between the thousands of horses and vehicles and expertly sweeping together and taking up the dung and depositing it in square iron boxes set like posts by the curbstones, which after a while are emptied by men coming around with a cart. The iron posts used for this purpose are square and black; the pillar posts for dropping letters in are round and red, but still great numbers of letters are by careless people deposited in the manure posts.

There are thousands more of peculiarities in London that well might be mentioned, but I will not attempt it. I cannot notice nearly all I see, and I don't suppose I have seen a tenth part. In fact, a man might live here for ten years and not see a quarter of the things worthy of description.

The great Covent Market, a mile or more west of the Smithfield Market, is nearly as extensive for vegetables and fruits as the other is for meats. Here hundreds of loads of all sorts of vegetables produced in this country and France are daily brought. The stock of potatoes, onions, tomatoes, squashes, cucumbers, turnips, cabbages, cauliflowers, celery, and other vegetables here disposed of is very large. The same of apples, pears, grapes, and some other fruits. The onions are from Spain, also the grapes. I see very few melons, and they are of the musk variety. This is not a good melon country. The principal nuts sold are the English walnuts, of which large quantities are used. The fruits and smaller vegetables are brought in large, round, flat-bottomed baskets. There are several other wholesale markets for vegetables and fruits in other parts of the city, but very little retailing is done there. All are sold at wholesale to dealers, and consumers buy of them.

I should mention the article of watercresses. The English people are as found of them as the Italians are of dandelions. The cresses grow rapidly in running streams, and have a slightly aromatic, warming, agreeable taste, and are very tender. Formerly enough of them grew wild to supply the demand, but for many years cultivation has had to be re sorted to to meet the demand, and now hundreds of streams are growing the cresses. I am told that from twenty-five to fifty tons are daily brought to this market.

Restaurants and eating-places vary greatly in price. To get a good dinner at the first-class places, with wine, costs not less than five dollars. (Suffice it to say I have not patronized this class.) From this high elevation the prices descend beautifully to a shilling (twenty-five cents) for a steak, a chop, ham and eggs, etc; coffee and tea five pence to three pence per cup. There are cheaper places still, where corned beef and cabbage, roast beef, or beefsteak-pie can be had for five pence, rolls and butter two pence, bread and butter a penny, tea or coffee a penny to two pence, eggs, boiled or fried, a penny each. There are other shops, where a specialty is made of frying sausages and boiling potatoes. A section of sausage four or five inches in length and two boiled potatoes, including salt, pepper, and mustard, are furnished for two pence, and an additional length of sausage for a penny. The sausages are good, and the place is conducted in a cleanly manner. I have seen three persons kept busily engaged in handing out sausages and potatoes, or sausages and bread, or sausages and onions, to hungry multitudes. There are other shops where fish are fried in penny and two-penny pieces, to be eaten on the premises warm or carried away, as desired. There are a considerable number of potato bakers in various parts of the city; these have portable ovens on wheels, and conduct their business on or near the corners of the streets. Hot baked potatoes a ha'penny each. I must confess to having sometimes patronized these low-priced caterers, and have been well served. A piece of good sausage, a piece of fish, or a baked potato tastes just as well to me when a penny buys it as though it cost a shilling.

EXETER HALL MEETING.

Saturday, Sept. 24th.—To-day Mrs. Dr. E. B. Foote arrived here from Paris to assist me to represent the Liberals of America in the Freethinkers' Congress which commences to-morrow. As soon as I heard of her arrival I betook myself to the West End where she is stopping, and was glad to learn she is in good health and has enjoyed a pleasant summer. When we had disposed of the little visiting which needs must be indulged in after an absence from home for several months, we proposed to attend the meeting of American citizens called at Exeter Hall to mourn the death of President Garfield and pay a testimonial to his memory. The meeting was called at 4 P. M., and before the hour had arrived the capacious hall, capable of holding not less than six thousand people, was thoroughly filled, and all seemed to wear an air of sadness, and many were dressed in mourning. A large proportion of the audience were undoubtedly Americans, but probably the English were present in nearly equal numbers. A large American flag draped in deep mourning was at the back of the stage in front of the organ which stands at the end of the hall, and another flag at the front of the platform. The meeting was presided over by the American minister, Mr. James Russell Lowell, and seldom has any public meeting had an abler and more dignified chairman. I instinctively felt that America is well represented at the court of St. James's, and the Americans have just grounds for pride in their minister.

Amongst those present were Mr. Hoppin (Secretary of the American Legation), Mr. Nadal (second secretary), General Badeau (late American Consul-General in London), the Spanish minister, the Brazilian minister, the Brazilian Secretary of Legation, the Russian Chargé d'Affaires, the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires, the Military Attaché to the German Embassy, the Secretary of the Chinese Legation, the Earl of Dunraven, Hon. Joshua Nunn (Vice-Consul-General), Bishop Simpson, of Philadelphia, Col. Cheeseborough, the Rev. Mr. Felton, the Rev. Mr. Channing, Mr. Sprague, Mr. T. Hughes, Q.C, Mr. Moncure D. Conway, the Hon. N. Fish (late United States minister at Berne), Gen. Merritt, Mr. Smalley, Mr. B. F. Stevens (United States Government Dispatch Agent), Mr. Seligman, Captain Hamilton, Captain Blake, General Pile, and the Lady Mayoress.

Prayer was offered up by the Rev. Dr. Marshall, of Mississippi, the whole gathering upstanding the while.

The Chairman said: "Ladies and gentlemen, countrymen and countrywomen: The object of this meeting, as you all know, is to testify our respect for the character and services of the late President Garfield, and in so doing to offer such consolation as is possible to a noble mother and a noble wife suffering as few women have been called upon to suffer. It may seem a paradox, but the only alleviation of such grief is the sense of the greatness and costliness of the sacrifice that gave birth to it, and this sense is brought home to us by the measure in which others appreciate our loss. It is no exaggeration to say that the recent profoundly-touching spectacle of womanly devotedness, in its simplicity, its constancy, and its dignity, has moved the heart of mankind in a manner without any precedent in living memory. But to Americans everywhere it comes home with a pang of mingled sorrow, pride, and unspeakable domestic tenderness that none but ourselves can feel. This pang is made more poignant by exile, and yet you will all agree with me in feeling that the universal sympathy expressed here by all classes and conditions of men has made us sensible, as never before, that if we are in a strange we are not in a foreign land, and that if not at home we are at least in what Hawthorne so aptly called the 'old home.' I should gladly dwell at more length upon this fact, so consoling and so full of good omen, but I must not infringe on a resolution which will be ably spoken to. Yet I should do injustice to your feelings no less than to my own if I did not offer here our grateful acknowledgments to the august lady who, herself not unacquainted with grief, has shown so repeatedly and so touchingly how true a woman's heart may beat under the royal purple. On an occasion like this, when we are met together that we may give vent to a common feeling so deep and so earnest as to thrust aside every consideration of self, the wish of us all would be that what is said here should be simple, strong, and manly, as the character of the illustrious magistrate so untimely snatched from us in the very seedtime of noble purpose that would have sprung up in service as noble, that the words should be as tender and true as she has shown herself to be in whose bereavement we reverently claim to share as children of that blessed country that gave birth to him and to her. We cannot find words that could reach that lofty level. This is no place for the turnings and windings of dextrous rhetoric. In the presence of that death scene, so homely, so human, so august in its unostentatious heroism, the commonplaces of ordinary eulogy stammer with the sudden shame of their own inaptitude. Were we allowed to follow the natural promptings of our hearts, we would sum up all praise in the sacred old words, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant.' That death-scene was more than singular, it was unexampled. The whole civilized world was gathered about it in the breathless suspense of anxious solicitude, listened to the difficult breathing, counted the fluttering pulse, was cheered by the momentarry rally, and saddened by the inevitable relapse. And let us thank God and take courage when we reflect that it was through the manliness, the patience, the religious fortitude of the splendid victim that the tie of human brotherhood was thrilled to a consciousness of its sacred function. The 'one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin,' is a touch of heroism, our sympathy with which dignifies and ennobles. Science has wrought no greater marvel in the service of humanity than when it gave the world a common nervous system, and thus made mankind capable of a simultaneous emotion. One remarkable feature of that death-scene was the imperturbable good nature of the sufferer. This has been sometimes called a peculiarly American quality—a weakness if in excess or misapplied, but beautiful in its own genial place, as there and then it was. General Garfield once said to a friend, 'They tell me it is a defect of my character, but I cannot hate anybody.' Like Socrates, he seemed good-natured even with death, though there have been few men from whom death has ever wrenched a fairer heritage of opportunity. Physicians tell us that all men die well; but surely he was no ordinary man who could die well daily for eleven agonizing weeks, and of whom it could be said at last,

> 'He nothing common did or mean
> Upon the memorable scene.'

A fiber capable of such strain and wear as that is used only in the making of heroic natures. Twenty years ago General Garfield offered his life to his country, and he has died for her as truly and more faithfully now than if fate had accepted his offer then. Not only has his blood re-cemented the fabric of our union, but the dignity, the patience, the self-restraint, thoughtfulness for others, the serene valor which he showed under circumstances so disheartening and amid the wreck of hopes so splendid, are a possession and a stimulus to his countrymen forever. The emulation of examples like his makes nations great and keeps them so. The soil to which such men as he belonged is good to be born on, good to live on, good to die for and to be buried in. I had not the honor of any intimacy of friendship with this noble man. Others will speak of him from more intimate knowledge. I saw him once or twice only; but so deeply was I impressed with the seriousness and solidity of his character, with his eager interest in worthy objects, and with the statesman-like furniture of his mind, that when many years afterward he was nominated for the presidency, I rejoiced in the wisdom of the selection, and found in my memory an image of him clearer than that of any man I ever met of whom I had seen so little; and I may add that I have never known any man concerning whom a loving and admiring testimony was so uniform from men of every rank and character who had known him.

> 'None knew him but to love him;
> None named him but to praise.'

I shall not retrace the story of his life; but there is nothing that occurs to me so perfect in its completeness since the biblical story of Joseph. The poor lad who at thirteen could not read dies at fifty the tenant of an office second in dignity to none on earth, and the world mourns his loss as that of a personal relative. I find the words coming back to my lips in spite of me when I look for the secret of the universal interest—he was so human. An example of it was his kissing his venerable mother on the day of his inauguration. It was criticised, I remember hearing at the time, as a sin against good taste. I thought then, and I think now, that if we had found the story in 'Plutarch' we should have thought no worse of the hero of it. It was this pliability of the late President to the impulse of unconventional feeling that endeared him so much to his kind. Among the many stories that have been sent me illustrating the sorrow so universally felt here, none have touched me so much as these two: An old gardener said to his mistress, 'O ma'am, we felt somehow as if he belonged to us." And in a little village on the coast, where an evangelist held nightly services on the beach, prayer was offered regularly for the recovery of the President, and the weatherbeaten fishermen who stood around the preacher with bowed, uncovered heads, fervently responded 'Amen.' You will be interested to know that the benevolent Sir Moses Montefiore, now in his ninety-seventh year, telegraphed last week to Palestine to request that prayers might be offered for the recovery of the President in the synagogues of the four holy cities. It was no common man who could call forth, and justly call forth, an emotion so universal, an interest so sincere and so human. I said that this was no place for eulogy. They who deserve eulogy do not need it, and they who deserve it not are diminished by it. The dead at least can bear the truth, and have a right to that highest exercise of human speech. We are not called upon here to define General Garfield's place among the memorable of mankind. A great man is made up of qualties that meet with or make great occasions. We may surely say of him that the great qualities were there, and were always adequate to the need. Though less fortunate than Lincoln, his career was snapped short just as he was about to be tested by the supreme trial of creative statesmanship. We believe that he would have stood the test, and we have good reason for our faith. For this is certainly true of him, that a life more strenuous, a life of more constantly hightening tendency and fulfilment of more salutary and invigorating example, has not lived in a country that is rich in instances of such. Well may we be proud of him, this brother of ours, recognized also as a brother wherever men honor what is praiseworthy in man. Well may we thank God for him and love more the country that could produce and appreciate him; well may we sorrow for his loss, but not as those without hope. Great as the loss is—and the loss of faculties trained like his is the hardest of all to replace—yet we should show a want of faith in our country if we called it irreparable. Three times within living memory has the Vice-President succeeded to the presidential function without shock to our system, without detriment to our national honor, and without check to our prosperity. It would be an indignity to discuss here the character of him who is now our chief magistrate, who, more than any one, it is safe to say, has felt the pain of this blow; but there is no indecorum in saying what is known to all—that he is a gentleman of culture, of admittedly high intelligence, of unimpeachable character, of proved administrative ability, and that he enters on his high duties with a full sense of what such a succession implies. I am not one of those who believe that democracy, any more than any other form of government, will grow of itself. I am not a believer in perpetual motion in politics any more than in mechanics, but, in common with all of you, I have an imperturbable faith in the honesty, the intelligence, and the good sense of the American people, and in the destiny of the American republic."

General Merritt then moved the first resolution as follows:

"That in the death of President Garfield we have to deplore alike a great public misfortune and a loss personal to each of us; that the crime of political murder, which in each instances we abhor, has in this instance, without a conceivable motive or a single apologist, plunged a nation in lasting sorrow; taken from us a wise, firm, beloved chief magistrate, of proved capacity for rule, and bereaved us of a fellow-citizen, who leaves to Americans for all time to come an example of the simple manliness of a sincere life, of a death heroic in patient fortitude, and the priceless inheritance of a memory without stain."

He said that the nations of the civilized world had asked in reference to General Garfield, What manner of man was this? The question had been answered. President Garfield's life had been read as an open book; his heroism had been seen and admired these many weeks, and during that period his life had been recounted in palace and in cottage, and had evoked a sympathy which it was no exaggeration to say was unparalleled. Although born in humble life, and compelled at an early age to engage in honest toil in order to aid in the support of his widowed mother and the family dependent upon her, the late President had found leisure to study books, and became both a great general and a great statesman. The story of his life might be summed up by saying that he passed from the grade of a poor boy in the wilderness to the very highest station in the land. He was equally at home with the farm laborer, the scientific man, and the scholar. But the great heart of the nation turned to his memory as much for his simple manners, his genial good-heartedness, and the typical love which he displayed in all his domestic relations. As for his scholarly, soldierly, and statesman-like qualities, he (General Merritt) might mention an incident which illustrated in a remarkable degree General Garfield's dependence upon Divine Providence. On the day of the death of the martyred Lincoln there was an excited crowd in the streets of New York. At that time there was understood to be a very disloyal element in that city, and the news of the President's death evoked in the popular bosom a spirit of revenge. Menacing cries were heard, and even staid and experienced men were carried away by their feelings. At that moment Garfield stood forward, and, raising his hands, used these remarkable words: "Fellow citizens, God reigns, and the government at Washington still lives." The effect was magical. He turned the passions of the multitude in a new direction, and the danger of a popular tumult passed away. Now they might repeat Garfield's own words, "God reigns, and the government at Washington still lives." His successor, by the peaceful operation of the Constitution of the United States, had assumed office, and he (General Merritt) deemed it not improper for him to say that their heartfelt sympathies went out to the new President in the distressing and sorrowful and trying circumstances in which he found himself, confident as they were that, so far as in him lay, the aspirations, the hopes, and the purposes of the late President should be carried out. A great trial has been put upon them. Let them bear it like true American citizens, and cordially extend their forbearance and assistance to those who, for the time being, had to exercise executive authority."

The Rev. Bishop Simpson, in seconding the resolution, said the land of their birth was in deep mourning. He pictured to himself that afternoon the funeral procession passing from the capital of their nation, over plain and mountain, through country and city, wending its way to the former home of the late President on the banks of Lake Erie. Wherever that procession moved thousands of heads were bowed in tears. That meeting joined in sympathy and in thought that procession. They were far away from home, the ocean was between them and that land; but the American in sympathy and in thought was never far from home. He might love the land in which he sojourns, he might be delighted with the voices and the sights around him; but after all he turns back to the land of his birth and to his home, and his sympathies gather round the fireside there. They never could read fully Divine Providence, but at least there were some lessons that might be drawn from the sad event. The fair life of General Garfield became historic to a degree that could not have been without some such close. When he fell it was not America alone that mourned. Kings and emperors gather round his bier, and the queen of the greatest empire in the world dropped a tear beside his widow, and laid a wreath upon his tomb. God bless Queen Victoria for her womanly sympathy and for her queenly courtesy! But it was not only a lesson that young men might rise that he read in the life of General Garfield. He read also the steps by which permanent fame might be gained. The lamented President was no demagogue. As a young man, he did not aim at a political life; he sought not popularity. He sought to make himself a man, and did the work of a man, not being spoiled by official position. He (Bishop Simpson) might say that a more thoroughly-balanced and all-round character than that of General Garfield he had seldom seen. The late President was not great so much in any one particular line. He had no special genius that manifested itself out of all proportion in any one direction; but he was one of the grandest specimens of a solid, round, strong manhood that he (Bishop Simpson) had known. It had seemed to him that in inflicting upon them this suffering God had been teaching the nations of the earth the strength of the American republic. This was the fourth time a President had given way to a Vice-President under peculiar circumstances. Two of these Presidents died of disease; Lincoln and Garfield fell by the assassin's hand. Nevertheless, amidst these trying circumstances, there had never been a single voice raised against the regularity of the succession which the Constitution of the United States prescribes. The death of President Garfield was a loss, and yet somehow he had faith that it would be a gain to the world. "The blood of the martyrs," as it had been said, "was the seed of the church," That was true in politics as well as in religion. General Garfield crowned his virtues as a warrior and a statesman by a true Christian life. One little incident in illustration of this Bishop Simpson mentioned. The day preceding the nomination to the Presidency was a Sabbath, which was doubtless used by many parties to further their own ends. General Garfield, however, expecting no nomination, and desiring none, went to the house of a friend and spent the Sabbath at a little church, rather obscure, of his own denomination. And as President General Garfield was the same plain man that he was before becoming President; the same unassuming citizen, with the same honest deportment, the same manly bearing, and the same regularity of attendance at the church of his own denomination. He made himself the center of his household. He was the pride of his mother; he was her darling boy, and, perhaps, some might remember that when the intelligence reached her that some one had shot him, she cried, forgetting all about his presidency, "Who could be so cruel and so wicked as to kill my baby?"

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Rev. Dr. Channing afterward moved the following resolution:

"That we respectfully entreat the mother and widow of our lamented President to accept this all-inadequate expression of our sympathy; and we ask to be permitted to offer a tribute of reverent admiration for the pure influence which trained a son to those high qualities, and for the womanly constancy and courage, and more than wifely devotion with which, to the end, Mrs. Garfield sustained the strength and lightened the sufferings of her husband."

He said certainly since that dismal December Sunday, when the mourning bells tolled to testify the nation's grief for the death of the Prince Consort; and since that awful Good Friday midnight, when the civilized world stood horror-struck at the murder of President Lincoln at that very festival of peace which he was blessing with his genial presence, no such widespread woe had touched the heart of the twofold yet united Anglo-Saxon people as moved all when their eyes fell on the fatal telegram, "The Death of President Garfield." Was he (the Rev. Dr. Channing) but uttering the sentiments of Americans when, in response to the sympathies so profusely poured abroad from ecclesiastical and political assemblies, from platforms and pulpits, and the public press of Great Britain? He answered in the well-known words of brave old Tathall, "Blood is thicker than water." Henceforth, across the Atlantic and Pacific, and from pole to pole, Americans would say to brethen or sisters: "Henceforth let us be one. Our people shall be your people, our homes your homes; our legislative halls and courts of justice, our places of exchange and universities, our pulpits and altars, in spirit, aim, and effort, shall be one with yours in spreading Christian civilization, liberty in law, and the law of liberty throughout humanity." And if the honored Queen of England would but trust herself and her fortunes to the seas, and visit the republic, she would find by experience, multiplied in countless family circles, from the palatial homes of merchant princes to the log-huts of farmers on the prairies, that when, with womanly great-heartedness, she interchanged words of mutual commiseration with the anxious wife and woe-struck widow of James Garfield, she won the heart of the whole American people. And now, echoing in spirit the tones of the sovereign of the British empire, let them say to that bereft venerable mother and that prematurely widowed wife in their late happy home at Mentor, "Honored sisters! Be assured that the grand-souled son whom you nurtured—and the heroic husband whose toils and triumphs you so nobly shared—has not lived and died in vain." "Do you think my name will have a place in history?" President Garfield lately asked in confidence of a friend, bending over him. And the true answer was given, "Yes, a grand one; but one still grander in human hearts." That friend might well have said, "in the heart of humanity." General Garfield's coat of arms bore this motto, "In cruce vinco." And most grandly had his chivalric course kept true to that high Christian legend of disinterested self-sacrifice. His farewell benediction to the nations sounded abroad like a silver trumpet, "Let violence be no more heard within your lands; wasting nor destruction within your borders; but, in the name of the heavenly father and his beloved son, henceforth write on your walls salvation, and on your gates praise."

The resolution having been carried unanimously, Mr. J. S. Morgan next moved:

"That we desire to signify our grateful sense of the affectionate solicitude of which the Queen and people of this country have, during the whole period of the President's suffering and death, given so many varied and touching proofs; that they have endeared to us afresh the land of our forefathers; and have laid us under an obligation of brotherly good will which we can never sufficiently acknowledge, and never forget."

He remarked that the resolution was one that required no set speech to secure its acceptance, for it was sure to find a spontaneous response from every American heart. For nearly three long and anxious months Americans here had been watching by the bedside of their suffering and beloved President, marking every change, at one moment buoyed up with hope, the next in despair by the appearance of new and unexpected complications; and thus the weary weeks passed slowly on, until at last the strongest constitution yielded, and death released the manly sufferer. During all these anxious moments they had had around them here daily and hourly evidence of the presence, to an almost unprecedented degree, of that greatest of all earthly comforters, human sympathy. It was not simply the sympathy of the lips, it was real and hearty, it was all around and about them. They felt it in the atmosphere in which they moved; it had the directness and heartiness which belongs to the English character. It came from all classes—from the Queen—God bless her—through all grades and conditions, and it went straight to the hearts of the American people. It was but meet, therefore, that those Americans resident here, as well as those here for only a brief period, should take this fitting opportunity of expressing to their kinsmen on this side of the Atlantic their appreciation of their warm-hearted and generous sympathy, and with it the assurance that it would never be forgotten by Americans; that it would, as regards the two people, be the good seed which had been sown in a warm and fruitful soil to bring forth in the future fruit worthy of the seed and the soil. It would be the cementing in bonds of lasting friendship the two great Anglo-Saxon nations of the world, and who would venture to foretell or estimate the future results of such a friendship?

Mr. Moncure D. Conway seconded the resolution, remarking that the assassination of President Lincoln and President Garfield had served to strengthen in an extraordinary degree the bonds of fellowship between England and America. The sympathy expressed by the English people on the present occasion would never be forgotten by their transatlantic kinsmen. Ethnologists found fault with the word Anglo-Saxon. He would suggest that hereafter it should be replaced by the nobler word Anglo-American.

The resolution was carried, as was also another, which was put formally by the chairman:

"That these resolutions be sent to Mrs. Garfield, and that the minister of the United States be requested to communicate them to others as he may think proper."

The chairman announced that a funeral service would be held in the City Temple at noon Monday, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury had expressed his intention of preaching a funeral sermon, if possible, in St. Martin's Church, Trafalgar Square, Monday evening.

A gentleman wished to move a resolution which it was understood expressed confidence in President Arthur.

The chairman said the meeting had been called for the specific purpose of expressing condolence with the widow, and indignation at the crime by which President Garfield had fallen. He should feel very deeply the indecorum of adding any other resolution. In order to satisfy his own feelings and those which he knew existed in the minds and hearts of many others he had said what he did in his opening remarks, but a resolution embodying those remarks would, in his opinion, be altogether irrelevant.

The proceedings then terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman. D .B. M.

The Last from London.

LONDON, Sept. 30, 1881.

MY DEAR READERS: Perhaps I have remained long enough in this city and told you enough about it; but if you will let me give you some account of the meetings and doings of the Congress of Freethinkers, which has been held here, I will do so, and then be off; for "wist ye not that I must be about my father's business?" or, more properly, the business which you have set me about, to wit, to go around the world and write up some account of it. As I have Asia and some little of Africa to inspect and describe, it is clear it will not do for me to remain permanently in Europe, so to-morrow I propose to be off for the "promised land" by way of Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Berlin, Dresden, Prague, Vienna; over the Alps by the Simmering Pass to Trieste, in Italy, where I take steamer for Athens, Constantinople, Smyrna, Beyrout, Balbec, Damascus, Jerusalem, and all of Palestine, and then to Egypt, after which the steamer will take me down the Red Sea to Bombay, and then on to the rest of the oriental world.

There are some unpleasant reports coming in about the prevalence of cholera in Aden, in Arabia, where I proposed to stop, also in Siam, where I also wished to sojourn for a while. The cholera is not a cheerful foe to meet, and it has triumphed over thousands of stronger and more valorous antagonists than myself; but I have never taken cholera, though I have been among it, and hope I never may take it if I find myself among it again. As grim and chilling a visitant as it is, there is this much of compensation to him who dies of cholera: he is very sure not to be hung nor to be called upon to serve out a long, wearisome Christian sentence in a Christian prison. If it is not a pleasant death to die, it is tolerably speedy and sure, and the victim will certainly not be called upon to die again.

I have given over one hundred pounds, or five hundred dollars, for tickets to take me over the continent to the places named to visit Greece, Turkey, Palestine, and Egypt, ending at Suez, where I take steamer for Bombay. This will undoubtedly strike you, as it did me, like a big sum of money to pay for two or three months' traveling; but you must understand that the "holy land" is an expensive country to travel in. There are no railroads in God's country, very few hotels, very little means for traveling, save on the backs of donkeys and horses, and very little safety to one or two men venturing by themselves in those places where Yahweh used to take so much pleasure in perambulatiug, and where he delighted in showing forth his wonderful power. It is said he does not stay there so much as he used to, that he does not take so much pleasure there as he once did, and he has given up the country to thieves, robbers, and Bedouin Arabs. In this he has given additional proofs that he changes his mind and tires of things he once enjoyed. The story is that he once started a colony in that rugged country by selecting as his own chosen people a very savage, unprogressed, and unprincipled tribe, who had been starving forty years in the desert, or, what is next to it, living on manna (if anybody knows what that is), and authorized them to kill off the people in the most merciless manner who had peacefully occupied the country for centuries, killing old and young, man, woman, and child. But after he had helped this savage tribe to murder and extirpate the more peaceful people, who had cultivated farms and built cities, he had a great deal of trouble with the murderers. Although he had chosen them as a glory to himself, and to show his power to all the nations of the earth, and had promised to give his chosen people this land for a perpetual possession, they acted so shabbily, and he got so discouraged, disgusted, and angry at them that he "went back" on the pledges he had made them; he disinherited them and cut them off with less than a shilling, and they have ever since been compelled to wander like aliens and vagabonds over the face of the earth, and to this very day they are suffering a great deal of trouble and injustice in some of the greatest countries on the globe. Ever since that time Yahweh's chosen country of old has been a miserable place to live in, and was given up first to the pagan Romans, and now for many centuries to the Infidel Mohammedans, who, though they worship this same Yahweh under the name of Allah, have a hard time in God's country, and don't seem to know how to keep a hotel, how to make a railroad, nor much of any other kind of road. The supposition is that Yahweh has had so much to do in newer countries of the world, where he has started new governments and new churches, and where he has chosen new favorites, that he has let his first love, his first experiment, his first favorites, go to the dogs and the thieves, just as though he had never invested in that direction nor tried his hand at building a people, a permanent kingdom, in that little seven-by-nine country. So far as that country is concerned, he is a good deal like Baal in Phœnicia and Chaldea, Osiris in Egypt, Jupiter in Greece and Rome, and Odin in Scandinavia; he has gone out of fashion—in fact, has ceased to exist; and if other nations had not taken him up and made a big God of him he would never have been heard of again, or "hardly ever."

The big price which I have paid to get over this promised land, now so unpromising, includes hotel bills in Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, together with horses, tents, dragomen, and guides, for a month in Palestine. I think there are to be nine or ten tourists in the company, including Mr. Bridges and myself; but of them I will probably be able to tell you more further along. I expect to rejoin Mr. Bridges at Brindisi, on the steamer, on the southeastern coast of Italy, after which we will remain together. He writes me he is having a pleasant time in France, Belgium, Switzerland, Bavaria, Italy, etc., in much the same places as I visited last year. But all this, however, has nothing to do with our Congress; let me return to it.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS

assembled in the Hall of Science Sunday morning, Sept. 25th, and continued three days, holding three meeting on Sunday and two meetings on each Monday and Tuesday morning and evening. I will not report the business meetings on the last two mornings, but briefly say that some changes in the rules for the government of future Congresses were discussed and passed, and it was decided to hold the Congress next year in Paris in the first half of September, with Amsterdam for an alternative if anything should make it inconvenient to hold it in Paris. Other matters were discussed and other business transacted, but not of any special importance. I I will confine myself principally to the speeches made, and in this will avail myself to considerable extent of the notes made by Dr. Aveling and published in the National Reformer.

The Sunday morning meeting commenced at 11 o'clock. Delegates were present from Germany, Austria, Holland, Belgium, and France, with more in number from England as a matter of course. Mrs. Dr. E. B. Foote and myself were the only delegates from the United States, though in the evening meetings Mr. Wm. K. Dyer and Miss Holmes, of Boston, sojourning in Vienna, attended, but hardly as delegates. The members of the General Council took their place on the platform.

Mr. Bradlaugh, as chairman of the Council, took the chair of the Congress, to speak a few words of welcome to the assembled delegates, and to ask them to elect their president for the three days' work. Mr. Bradlaugh said that it was a most useful thing that Freethinkers of various nationalities should gather in Congress, and so draw closer the bonds of international sympathy. Many attempts had been made to form an International federation, but it was to the Freethinkers of Belgium, to their energy, their patience, and their industry that was due the successful Congress of 1880, and therefore the gathering of that day. It would be most ungrateful not to place on record their thanks for the steps taken by the Belgians to make organization possible. It was his duty only to speak the heartiest word of welcome possible to those who had gathered there in council. One word of special greeting might be said to one there present, one of Germany's noblest sons, whose work on "Matter and Force" had made his name familiar to all English Freethinkers—Prof. Ludwig Büchner. It was now for the Congress to elect its president, and a representative from each country to form the bureau. Dr. Büchner said his only duty was to bid them welcome, and call them to begin the work that lay before them.

Mr. Hilditch proposed that Mr. Bradlaugh should be president for the three days; but Mr. Bradlaugh, interposing, asked that they would elect one of the distinguished foreigners who were their guests.

Dr. Davey then proposed Dr. Büchner, and the name being received with loud cheers, Dr. Büchner was unanimously voted into the chair.

The delegates of each country then selected one of their number to form the bureau. The following were unanimously chosen, and took their seats on the platform: Belgium, M. Vancauberg; England, Mr. Bradlaugh; France, M. Le Lubez; Germany, Dr. Schläeger; Holland, M. d'Ablaing van Geissenburgh; the United States, by your humble servant. (Austria and Canada were represented later in the Conference, but not in time for their representatives to be placed in the bureau.)

The secretary of the general council, Mr. Swaagman, then read the following report:

On behalf of the general council appointed to sit in London for the year 1881, pursuant to Article three of the statutes adopted at the Brussels Conference, 1880, I beg to report that the following countries elected members to the general council prior to the 1st January, 1881:

For England—Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh.

For Canada—Dr. Edward B. Aveling and W. H. Reynolds.

For the United States of America—Mr. Councilor Slater and Mr. Symes.

For Germany—J. Swaagman and V. L. Rokicke.

For Belgium—G. J. Holyoake and P. A. V. Le Lubez.

For Holland—Annie Besant and J. Swaagman.

No other countries had, up to that date, in any way complied with the statutes passed at Brussels. During the present year the Hindoo Freethought Union, of which P. Murugesa Mudaliar is secretary, and which has its headquarters at Madras, has formally resolved to affiliate itself with the International Federation, and to appoint representatives to this council.

In France no steps whatever were taken prior to the 1st January, 1881, to elect any members to this Council, although France was largely represented at, and concurred in, the decisions of the Brussels Congress. Directly after its first meeting in January last, your Council wrote to M. Goffin, the president of the Brussels Congress, and to several of the delegates from France who had been present at the Brussels Conference, pointing out the difficulty likely to arise, and which, in fact, has so arisen, from France being unrepresented on the general council. Your Council was then informed that a Freethought Congress had been held in Paris on the 5th December, 1880, but that it had adjourned until the 1st May, 1881, without electing any members to this Council, and without taking any steps whatever to put itself in communication with this Council. Two delegates from the Federation of the Libre Pensée of Paris attended informally, M. Hector France, on three occasions and M. Leduc on one occasion, at the meetings of your Council; but, on their attention being called to the statutes passed at Brussels, stated that they had even then no authority to affiliate the societies they represented to this Federation, and further stated that they were not prepared even to coöperate with a large and important organization of French Freethinkers called the Union Anticléricale, by which a Freethought Congress had been convoked in Paris in May. These informal delegates from France had their attention specially called to article eight of the statutes of Brussels, which distinctly declares that the societies which had not made the payment provided by that article should not be allowed to take any part in the forthcoming Congress.

The French delegates stated that they were quite aware of this article, and would specially call the attention of their societies to the matter. No payment of any kind has, however, been made by any French society, and your Council were wholly unable, therefore, to call the Congress in Paris, if they paid any obedience to the solemn statutes of the federation. Nor would the French society even work in association with your Council, nor promise even to be responsible for the necessary details of business arrangements. They announced in July that they had convoked a Congress in Paris, without any reference to the Council of the International, or any communication with it. Your Council, on inquiry, found that those who had thus, without authorization, called the Congress, were an extreme section of Socialistic Revolutionists, and they felt that as they were charged to preserve the International Federation of Freethinkers from all connection with political controversy, they could not leave the arrangements for the Congress, placed in their hands by the statutes, under the sole direction of those who, however good and earnest, were antagonistic to the fundamental principles sanctioned at Brussels, Your Council venture to think that the wisdom of their decision has been proved by the action taken by the unaffiliated Paris groups, who, without belonging to the Federation, have actually proposed—your Council does not know if the proposition has been carried—that article two shall be altered in the sense rejected at the Brussels Conference, and that the Federation shall war against "all prejudices" instead of against religious only. Under these difficult circumstances, your Council resolved to call the Congress in London, the only affiliated English society, the National Secular, being willing to accept the arrangement and the pecuniary responsibility of business details. Your Council, in compliance with rule eleven, elected J. Swaagman, secretary; P. A. V. LeLubez, treasurer; and Charles Bradlaugh, chairman. It has met monthly, and the minute book is laid on the table for the inspection of members, and in this will be found exact reports of all action taken.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

WE hav plenty more of those colored posters on hand which we will gladly send to any friend who takes enough interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER to aid in extending its circulation.

Our National Insanity.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Insanity is simply an excessiv excitement which deranges the mental balance and givs undue prominence to any thought, emotion, or passion. This excitability, running to insanity, is a characteristic of the American people, and is seen in the ultraism and extravagance of all parties and sects.

The prevailing craze about President Garfield is a good illustration of the national character. General Garfield was a man of many fine sentiments, but not a man of moral courage and strict integrity. If he was the saint which his eulogists would now make him, it was never discovered before. He was a politician, and his ways were those of politicians generally. The good in his character largely overbalanced the evil; but it is simply madness to look upon his death as a national calamity. There are several thousand men in this country who would make as good a president as General Garfield possibly could hav made. Our modest friend, for example, the editor of The Truth Seeker, could giv us as good, and probably a better and more reliable, administration than could hav been realized under Garfield. I could name many individuals, men and women, who, I am sure, could giv us a wiser administration than any of the congressional politicians. Why, then, this insane paroxysm of despair over the death of Garfield?

It is a sad confession, but we cannot well deny that this outburst of feeling is simply a remnant of the old European idolatry of rank, power, and success—the worship of kingly office and state, which is unbecoming to a republican. Had General Garfield not sought office ambitiously, had he resigned his place in Congress, lived in a cheap boarding-house, and devoted his talents conscientiously to any line of personal and public duty, his death would not hav excited a ripple of feeling on the ocean of public sentiment. A modest local funeral and a paragraph, perhaps, in most of our papers would hav been the only manifestation. If a few of the delegates in the nominating convention had voted differently General Garfield's death would hav raised no more feeling than a hundred other deaths of congressmen and generals. All beyond that was a tribute to the office, not the man.

But Mrs. Garfield is also an object of idolatry today, simply because she married General Garfield. Millions of American women manifest the same good sense and good deportment as wives for which she is honored. And if she had married more humbly her virtues would hav been known to few.

Shall the accidents of rank and office destroy all conceptions of justice and equality among men and pervert all benevolent impulses from their proper and rational course?

President Garfield was no martyr any more than other victims of homicide or of an accidental bullet. His death was morally and physically an accident; but the horror excited by the assassination has deranged the public mind and roused a flow of feeling which pours wealth into the purse of his wife, who was already in possession of a handsome income that would generally be considered wealth.

This passionate generosity to one who does not need it is a sad perversion of charity. Thousands of men and women worthy in every way of our regard appeal to the people's sympathy, but the wealth that could relieve them goes to the one family that does not need or ask it, and is withheld from the sufferers.

If Mrs. Garfield were to-day only one of the Michigan sufferers, and not a president's wife, she might mourn in bitter agony over her husband and children burned alive, and in the midst of her gloomy horror, look upon the ashes of her happy home, and gather with her own hands the calcined bones of all the loved while fainting with hunger and hopelessness, yet hear no words of sympathy from the distant homes of wealth, and witness from afar the golden tide flowing to enrich a favorit, while contemplating the blankness of her own desolation. Alas, do not five hundred impoverished and beggared widows of the burned alive desire more help than one wealthy widow from assassination? The nation says not, if we may judge from the relativly scanty pittance that reaches the Michigan widow in the ashes of her home. Before our republic was founded our forefathers declared the freedom and equality of all men. Let us not bury this noble sentiment under a flood of idolatry to office and power. B.

Thoughts on Prayer.

General regret at the final result in regard to President Garfield is seen all around. It was not wise in the believers in the efficacy of prayer to commence their labors before his recovery was assured. We see it suggested that the churches should offer up prayers for rain, but in order to hav the prayers answered it would be best to defer them until about the close of the present dry time. We think, however, the time is near when the idea of restoring to health, by prayer, an incurable invalid, or a great and useful man when fatally wounded, will be considered an absurdity; or of transcending, suspending, or changing any law of the universe by the same means nonsense and folly. God is the universe, and the universe and its laws are God, will be the orthodoxy of the future, although it is the revolting heresy of the many to-day. We hav never seen any evidence of any power in the universe except through or by its laws, and to expect to accomplish anything by appeals to a personal deity is as heathenish, as unmeaning to us, as it would be to supplicate a god of wood or stone. We would regret indeed to shock any one by the enunciation of our views on this subject, and would restrain our thoughts if we did not believe the time had now come when mankind should advance into more light, truth, intelligence, and general usefulness, wasting no more time in idle supplications that avail nothing.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The above was the closing paragraph to a weekly communication to one of our county papers to which I had long been a correspondent. It was written soon after the death of President Garfield, and was promptly rejected by the editor; but as I believe the thoughts to be true, and desire them to liv after me, I would be glad indeed if they could hav place in The Truth Seeker. Fifty years hence, and what then? Editors then will not be in servilty to superstition, absurdity, and folly, as the vast majority are at the present time. Albert Livezey.

Efficacy of Prayer.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Among the mixed population of this globe are millions of honest, earnest, and intelligent people who believe in special divine providence, and who daily offer their papers to deity with the full expectation that such prayers will be answered, while millions of other equally honest and intelligent inhabitants believe that the great, immeasureable, incomprehensible, and unknowable power which governs this pigmy earth of ours, together with the countless millions of other celestial spheres, acts according to fixed laws and that prayer is simply an absurd human request that some of these fixed laws may be broken. The former class, it would seem, might learn a lesson, never to be forgotten, in the death of our lamented President.

From the hour of Garfield's assassination until death ended his suffering, there was one continuous prayer all over the civilized world for his recovery.

This universal sympathy was aroused not wholly because Garfield was duly elected chief magistrate of a great nation, but because he was a man, a husband, and a father who had been stricken down without provocation by the murderous hand of an assassin, and human nature revolted at the injustice and the inhumanity of the monster who could perpetrate such an act.

Probably never before in the history of the world was such a spectacle witnessed. The people of every creed and denomination, of every political and religious organization, of every nation, government, or tribe the world over, almost as a unit, asking, praying, and hoping for the same result, but alas! without effect.

Ordinarily, the prayers of the human race are a conglomerate mixture. We find people asking at the same moment for rain and sunshine, for heat and for cold. Contending armies are courting divine aid to destroy each other, politicians are praying for help, necessarily at the expense of their opponents, while millions of smaller but equally absurd petitions are continually being offered by the masses. But in the case of our lamented President the world as a unit worked together, prayed in one direction, and hoped for the same result. Thirteen hundred millions of people asked, and were refused, for their prayers brought nothing.

With these patent facts staring us all in the face, we are led to inquire, in the name of common sense, of what possible avail can be the individual prayer?

H. L. Green's Notes from his Lecture Tour.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: On Sunday last I lectured before the Spiritualists and other Liberals of Kalamazoo. The audience was not large, but was intelligent and listened attentivly to what I had to say in favor of the religion of humanity as against the religions of creed. At the close of my lecture the president arose and stated that there was not a word I had said but what Spiritualists could fully indorse. We had good vocal and instrumental music.

At Kalamazoo I had the pleasure of forming the personal acquaintance of one of your subscribers, Lucius C. West, a young lawyer, who is an intelligent and earnest Liberalist. Mr. West is the author of a new work entitled, "Paul Hart; or, the Love of his Life," just published, and which was recently noticed at some length in The Truth Seeker. I am indebted to friend West for a copy, and I hav read it with great interest. It is a romance most admirably adapted to be read by young people. It is entirely free from Christian cant and superstition and inculcates good Liberal views. It is one of the few juvenil books that Freethinking parents can with safety put into the hands of their children. I understand it is for sale at The Truth Seeker office, and every one of your readers who hav nearly or fully grown-up children should order a copy. "Uncle Lute" has given the Liberal public a most valuable production. It should hav a large sale.

If lecturers do not receive great pecuniary rewards for their labors they often are greatly compensated by the valuable acquaintances they form in the various places they visit. That has been my experience so far.

On Monday evening last I spoke in Plainwell, Mich., and was pleased to find there a pleasant hall owned by Mrs. Drake of that town, who contributes the use of it to all Liberal meetings. Mrs. Drake has for many years been known as an earnest friend of reform. She is now speaking on the Greenback platform and is said to be one of the most eloquent speakers in that party.

On Wednesday evening I addressed a large audience in Allegan, Michigan. For the privilege I was indebted to that most earnest of Freethinkers, Iria Chaffee, who for forty years has held up the banner of Freethought in that community. His house is the generous home of all Liberal lecturers who go that way, and his pleasant and generous wife, who fully agrees with him in his Liberal ideas, seems to take great pleasure in doing all in her power to make one feel at home and comfortable while there.

Mr. Chaffee out of his own pocket paid for the hall, for the printing of the bills, and added five dollars to the very generous contribution taken at the close of the lecture for the speaker. Mr. Chaffee has been one of the leading business men of his town for many years, keeping constantly in his employ from fifty to a hundred persons, and a friend of his informed me that he had a way ("John's Way," as Elmina says, I suppose) of making them all love and respect him. In fact, his great heart makes him popular with the whole community.

For the last few days I hav been stopping in this city (Grand Rapids), making arrangements to speak at various places in this vicinity. To-morrow evening I speak in Good Templars' Hall here, the hall occupied by the Spiritualists.

Everywhere I go I find the Spiritualists to be Liberalists, and whatever we may think of their philosophy, we must admit that they hav done and are doing a great work in liberating the human mind from the thraldom of Christian superstition.

Everybody in the Liberal ranks that I meet is much pleased with the action of the late Liberal League Congress, and predicts that now the movement for the entire secularization of the state is to be a great success. I predict that more auxiliary Leagues will be organized this year than in any previous year. So far as I am concerned I shall do what little I can to aid in organization. At Chicago I was pleased to learn that over five hundred dollars was subscribed to defray the expenses of the coming year, and a resolution or recommendation passed to add at least fifteen hundred dollars to that amount. The treasurer is now receiving subscriptions of twenty dollars each, to be paid in quarterly payments of five dollars. Now let friends everywhere who can afford it forward their twenty-dollar subscriptions to Courtlandt Palmer, the treasurer of the League. And let those who can't afford to contribute so large a sum send in what they can afford to. We hav now ceased our domestic contentions; let us for a few years all join hands and hearts and bravely enter the great and irrepressible conflict now raging between liberty, light, and knowledge on one side and slavery, superstition, and ignorance on the other.

My address for the present is Otsego, Allegan Co., Mich. H. L. Green.

The Iowa Convention.

The annual convention of the Iowa Liberal League convened at Hart & Wetzel's Hall, Cedar Rapids, Saturday, Sep. 24th, at 7:30 P.M., Vice-president M. E. Billings in the chair. There were three sessions Sunday, which were very interesting. The attendance was small, but included some very earnest workers from a distance, among whom may be named Dr. Miller, of Washington county, and Mrs. Axtell, of Brighton, same county; Dr. J. C. Hastings, of Quasqueton; Alex Risk, of Winthrop; C.V. Miller, of Jones county; Mrs. S. J. Lenont, of Nevin; A.V. Forrester, of Vinton, F. E. Zalesky, of Blairstown, and Dr. Fish and John Stratford, of Palo. The conference meetings were very pleasantly occupied in the discussion of topics connected with the work of the League. Col. M. E. Billings spoke very acceptably several times, his Sunday evening discourse touching the evidence for the existence of the reputed Jesus Christ being very warmly applauded by a large and appreciativ audience.

All the expenses of the convention were met, one new life and several new annual members were received, and the old board of officers reëlected as follows: President, M. Farrington, Denver; vice-presidents, Dr. Shorland Harris, Mason City; Col. M. E. Billings, Waverly; Mrs. C. P. Robinson, Nevada; Abram Clegg, Des Moines; secretary and chairman of the Executiv Committee, E. C. Walker, Cedar Rapids; treasurer, Mrs. Cornelia Boecklin, Burlington. The board of directors consists of the president, secretary, treasurer, and C. W. Dibble, Osceola, and Leroy Dutton, Grand Mound.

Now, where shall the next annual convention be held? What place in the state will make us the best offer? What will Ottumwa, Des Moines, Waverly, Fort Dodge, or other city do? Let us hear from you.

Funds are needed to print constitutions and other documents—imperativly needed. How many Iowa secularists wish to become life or annual members of the Iowa Liberal League? Annual, fifty cents; life, five dollars.

The convention passed resolutions reaffirming the principles and demands of its Constitution adopted last year; expressing profound respect for Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., and extending congratulations to Gov. Roberts of Texas. E. C. WALKER, Sec.

League Notes from Illinois.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I can most heartily reiterate the words of T. C. Leland in his late address to the Liberals of this country. The fifth annual congress of the National Liberal League, which closed its three days' session in Chicago on Sunday evening, Oct. 2, 1881, was a perfect success. All differences hav been reconciled and perfect harmony restored. And as the National Liberal League has seen proper to reëlect me to the position of Chairman of the Sub-Executiv Committee in Illinois, I hope and trust the Liberals of Illinois will do something to help me in the work over this state during the next year. And if I receive a little help from each one who really wishes our cause to prosper I shall be able to accomplish a good deal more during the year to come than I hav in the year that is past. I hav traveled about two thousand miles during the fourteen months just past, and as to the good I hav accomplished for the Liberal cause in Illinois, I will leave that for those who are familiar with the work I hav done to say. But financially I am over one hundred dollars poorer than when I left Rockford, August 9th, 1880. This may seem a small loss to some, but when it is all a person has in the world to do with, then it does not appear so little.

I am now on my road to Rockford once more, but I only go there to prepare for future work. I hope to organize local auxiliary Leagues all over the state of Illinois before the meeting of the next annual Liberal League congress. Let any one desiring to hav a local League in their town or city correspond with me.

We hav now eighty-five life members to the state League of Illinois. Who will be the next man or woman to send me a dollar and become a life member to the Illinois State Liberal League? The money thus received will help me in getting up the next annual state League convention. Address me until otherwise advised at Rockford, Ill.

Yours for universal mental liberty,
F. F. FOLLET, Sec. State L. L., Ill.

Northern Ohio Spiritualists.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

Owing to the inclemency of the weather, the grove meeting announced to take place at Brady Lake, Oct. 1st and 2nd, at which it was designed to organize a camp-meeting association, was unavoidably given up, and the friends assembled instead at the residence of C. S. Curtis of this place, and proceeded to organize said camp-meeting association. Dr. A. Underhill, of Akron, was chosen temporary chairman and C. S. Curtis secretary. After the chairman had explained the full object of the meeting, a preamble, constitution, and title were adopted, and the following officers chosen: President, Ira Lake, of Norwalk; vice-presidents, Dr. A. Underhill, of Akron, and Mrs. Amon, of Cleveland; corresponding secretary, Sarah Rockhill, of Alliance; recording secretary, Mrs. M. A. Merrills, of Kent; treasurer, Silas Crocker, of Shalersville; directors, Lewis King, of Cleves; Samuel Smith, of Milan; M. V. Miller, of New Lime; Frank O. Riley, of Warren, and Jesse Erwin, of Alliance; trustees, Reuben Halstead, of Mantua, Mrs. Mercy Lane, of Braceville, and Frank Maloy, of Hudson, Ohio.

Whether the association will be merely organized under "the state religious societies laws," or become a joint stock company will be determined hereafter, as will also the location of the camp grounds. Prominent among the speakers and Spiritualists were Hudson and Emma Tuttle, O. P. Kellogg, Dr. Underhill, Thomas Lees, Mr. and Mrs. Bostwick, Mrs. Mary Skinner, Mrs. Carrie Hazen, and Mr. William Hazen and wife. The meeting adjourned subject to the call of the president.

The business meeting was supplemented by social and literary exercises, Mrs. Emma Tuttle leading off with a poem, followed by remarks from Messrs. Hudson Tuttle, O. P. Kellogg, Dr. Underhill, and others. The lunch was then prepared by Mrs. Curtis, the hostess, and by some miracle or other the entire party was regaled with a substantial meal.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 56.

613. I cannot think that the quarrels and contentions that took place over the New Testament collection, the councils that were from time to time called to decide which books were written by divine aid, and which were not, were any mark of a divine supervision or care thrown over them. Some members of the councils were opposed to the admission of some of the books which form our canon, while others contested that other books regarded as spurious should be admitted. The contentions that arose in consequence of these diversities of opinion were often painful to witness. Gregory Nazianzen was so disgusted with these quarrelsome councils that he said they were made up of geese and cranes and were not worth listening to, as no good came from their ceaseless contentions. Sometimes the contentions between the bishops and priests composing them ran so high that they resorted to blows. In one instance the Patriarch of Constantinople was so severely kicked and cuffed by the Bishop of Alexandria that he died three days afterward. It is reported that the divinity of the books forming the New Testament canon was often decided by vote, and it is stated that upon one occassion the gospel according to St. Luke was admitted by a single vote. But the decisions made by one council were set aside by the next council held, so that the uncertainty as to which books should be accepted and which should be discarded remained unsettled until the sixth century; and even for more than a thousand years it was contended that some books were admitted that should have been discarded, and some discarded that should have been admitted. Even down to the time of the Reformation the canon was not accepted in its entirety. Luther discarded the Apocalypse and the epistle of James, calling the latter a strawy epistle. Calvin discarded the epistle to the Hebrews as well as the second epistle of Peter, while others of the books were condemned by other prominent Christian leaders. In fact, in view of the continuous quarrels and contentions that have existed in reference to the composition of the canon, the most devout and prayerful believer in the divine providence superintending the entire business must be at a great loss to decide which is God's word and which is simply man's production.

614. The learned Dr. Davidson has the fairness to speak many truths with regard to the New Testament canon. He says: "The infancy of the canon was cradled in an uncritical age and rocked with uncritical ease. Of the three fathers who contributed most to its early growth, Irenæus was credulous. Tertullian passionate and one-sided, and Clement of Alexandria was mainly occupied with ecclesiastical ethics. No analysis of the different books was seriously attempted. In the absence of custom, accident, taste, practical needs directed the tendency of tradition. Their decisions were much more the result of pious feeling biased by their theological speculations than the conclusions of a sound judgment." Again he says: "Nowhere along the line have we a particle of evidence of any supernatural guidance or illumination which enabled those who judged between these books and others to decide which were and which were not of supernatural origin. The most various motives contributed to the arrangement finally agreed upon. Some were prudential, others were superstitious. Few, almost none, were critical. The Roman Catholic assumes that there was supernatural guidance of the church to her decision. The Protestant denying this—as well he may, for it has not a particle of evidence—is forced to the conclusion that the determination of the limits of infallibility and inspiration was left to be decided in the course of several centuries by men of dubious character and doubtful scholarship, or by the superstitions and passions of the crowd. Sure such a conclusion ought to hush forever all the arrogant assumptions that are made upon this head, and by the petty taunts which orthodoxy hurls at those who feel obliged to go behind the superstitions and opinions of the early church to test every book by scientific methods and to accord to each particular part as much of reverence and authority as it demands on its intrinsic merits."

615. I do not believe that either Judaism or Christianity is an original system of religion. All the marked features of each existed before these systems were known. This position is very susceptible of elucidation. Let us first look a little at the doctrines of Judaism. The God of Abraham was at first a mere family god, as was common at the time in that part of the world; he gradually developed into a tribal god, and later on a national god, and now, by the help of Christians, it is aimed to make him a universal god. His origin was extremely small, as were those of the gods of surrounding tribes and nations. 2. The ideas of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob respecting their god were crude and anthropomorphic, the same as the notions maintained by the crude people around them. 3. The matter of building altars upon which to make sacrifices was common among other nations before practiced by Abraham and his descendants. 4. The sacrifice of animals to the gods was practiced by numerous nations before Abraham existed. 5. The priesthood was by no means new with the Jews. All systems of religion before them and since had their priests and holy men. 6. Circumcision was by no means first practiced by the Jews. It was used before them by the Egyptians, the Colchians, the Ethiopians, and the Syrians. 7. Monotheism was not new with the Jews. It had been taught to the Persians by Zoroaster before the Jews were a nation. Besides, they held to a plurality of gods. They had their El-Shaddai, their Eloah, and later on their Yahweh, Jahveh, or Jehovah. When in the beginning one of the gods said to the other, "Let us make man," the plurality of gods was clearly set forth. The translator, contrary to any authority in the original text, gave all these gods the same name. 8. The plan of the tabernacle and the temple of the Jews was not new nor original, but was the same as had been used by the Egyptians, probably for centuries. 9. The robes and toggery of the priesthood were also patterned after those of the Egyptian and Persian priests. 10. The ceremony of anointing the kings and priests with holy oil was borrowed from the Egyptian and older systems. 11. Lands were set aside for the benefit of the Jewish priesthood the same as the Egyptians had done at an earlier date. 12. The festivals and ceremonies observed by the Hebrews were very much like those previously observed by the Egyptians. 13. Prophets existed in Egypt, Persia, India, and other countries long before there were any Hebrew prophets. 14. Incense and fragrant oils were used in worship by pagan nations long prior to the Hebrews. 15. The laying the sins of the people upon the head of an animal to be carried off into the wilderness was practiced by other nations before the Jews. 16. A decalogue, or table of laws, was common in several countries before the time of the Jews. 17. The Jews were by no means the first to have sacred writings. The Hindoos, the Persians, the Chinese, and the Egyptians were certainly before them in this. 18. Consulting the gods with reference to temporal and spiritual affairs was practiced by other nations long before the Jews. 19. It was believed by other nations anterior to the Hebrews that the gods spoke through chosen persons and directed the affairs of men. 20. Long before the Jews the believers in other systems of religion believed that their gods got angry at the wickedness of the people and sent judgments upon them in consequence. 21. If there was anything new or original in Judaism I certainly do not know what it is.

616. It is the same with Christianity. I do not believe there is a feature or dogma in it that was not earlier the property of other systems of religion. First. The belief that a god cohabited with a human female, and as an offspring produced a demi-god, a being half god and half man, was believed by many nations from five hundred to a thousand years before Christianity existed.

617. Second. The myth of the virgin and child was common in Egypt and several other heathen countries long prior to Christianity. The artistic representations of Isis and the infant Horus were taken from Egypt to Rome and became the models for the Christian Madonna and child.

618. Third. The belief in a demi-god, or a son of god, suffering as a propitiation for the sins of the world was by no means first held to by Christians. The idea was a thousand years before held in India and other countries. Fully forty saviors or sons of gods have been believed in.

619. Fourth. The belief that the son of a god was put to death on the cross for the good of mankind was very common in several countries long before Christianity adopted a similar belief. This is true of several Asiatic countries as well as of Greece. Christna was said to have been crucified, and so was Prometheus, and the drama of his crucifixion was played upon the stage of Athens five hundred years before the time of Christ, much as the passion-play representing the crucifixion of Jesus is played on the stage of our own time. It is claimed there have been not less than sixteen crucified saviors beside Jesus and prior to his time.

620. Fifth. Jesus was not the first demi-god said to have been born in a manger. Several of his predecessors were claimed to have been born in that humble situation.

621. Sixth. Jesus was not the first whose birth was announced by the angels to the shepherds watching their flocks in the vicinity. The same was the case at the birth of Christna and other divine personages.

622. Seventh. The birthplace of Jesus was not the first believed to have been pointed out by the stars. This marvel was related of others long before him.

623. Eighth. The twenty-fifth day of December was not first appropriated to Jesus as a birth-day. It was commemorated as the birth-day of Mithra, in Persia, many hundreds of years before the dawn of Christianity, and was kept as a festival day in many countries for centuries before the name of Jesus was ever spoken. The custom probably arose in the system of sun-worship, as on the the twenty-fifth of December the sun begins to rise from the night of death into which it had sunk, and new life and hope from this fact was imparted to the world. Christians unquestionably availed themselves of this ancient heathen festival day and claimed that it was the day upon which their God was born, and as the day had been kept as a festival from time immemorial, they gladly availed themselves of the popularity which had long been accorded to that day and fixed the birth of Jesus just at that time. It does not appear by any record of Jesus at what time of the year he was born, and as a proof of the great ignorance which exists upon the subject, it is only necessary to state that every month in the year has been claimed by prominent Christian writers as the month in which he first saw the light of the sun. They are altogether in the fog as to the month and the day on which their god was born. The twenty-fifth of December was unquestionably taken because it had long been held as a popular festival day in the pagan world.

IF any one would like to send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to a friend who has never taken it, it will only cost them fifty cents to do so.

Letters from Friends.

ERIE, COL., Oct. 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will please find $6.50—$5 for the world trip and $1.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing you a pleasant trip and a speedy return, I remain Yours, etc., JOSEPH GARLICK.

LOWELL, VT., Oct. 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find check for $5.50—$5 to apply on L. R. Wellman's share in Round-the-World fund, and the balance to even up on a copy of "Bennett-Mair Discussion," which you will please send in due time. Yours, ALBERT FLETCHER.

SUMMITVILLE, COL., Oct. 14, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed lease find money order for $8.50—$3 for your excellent paper, and $5 for this grand volume which you intend to issue and which I would not miss for anything. I am living pretty well up in the clouds, about one thousand feet above the level of the sea, and in one of the richest gold-producing mining districts of the county, and if Mr. Bennett will accept one of these rich-bearing nuggets, I shall send him in one before he returns from his round-the-world trip. Yours truly,
FRED SEIMS.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., Oct. 10, 1881.

MY DEAR MACDONALD: Some friends hav feared that THE TRUTH SEEKER would suffer in the absence of our Bennett. Your editorial on the ark question, in answer to the Rev. Smith, of Oregon, is able and conclusiv, and would be a squelcher to any one but a priest; he never can be squelched, nor stay so.

Be of good cheer, my dear Macdonald; the friends are bound to be better acquainted with you soon. Go right on in the ways of well-doing and good writing in your search after truth.

Wakeman's report of the "Progress of Liberalism the Past Year" is a most admirable production, and too good to be read by the Liberals only. It should go into the hostil camps, organized for fighting the devil and damning souls. That is the field for effectiv Liberal missionary work. Would it not be judicious to suggest to us Liberals to subscribe to send fifty thousand circular copies of that report into those camps? It contains just the information they need. They continually thrust under our noses the stench of their tracts of "theological swill" (Beecher). Let us return a better missionary compliment by presenting them reports and facts of the good and true.

Tell Wakeman for me that there are a shaking hand and a warm heart in Berrien Springs, Michigan, for him and the noble souls who work in and for THE TRUTH SEEKER. WORTHY PUTNAM.

CONCORD, KY., Oct. 11, 1881.

DEAR MRS. BENNETT: Inclosed find five dollars. We watch the progress of THE TRUTH SEEKER with unabated interest, glad that it continues as ever the tributary of important intelligence and valuable ideas. Mr. Bennett's letters are proving equal to our expectations, and we think contribute immensely to the interest of the paper. Hoping that your own way may be smooth and pleasant in his absence, I remain, Yours truly, VIRGINIA E. VANCE.

FORSYTH, GA., Sept. 26, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The foul deed is accomplished; and the President, after eighty days of struggling against the death-wound of the assassin, has breathed his last, and the nation as one man mourns his loss. No greater calamity could hav befallen the people; and at first glance it would seem that no possible good could be derived from an event so thorougly fraught with evil and so deplorable in all its surroundings. But as out of all evils some good may be derived, let us hope that the death of our chief magistrate will at least subserve the good purpose of opening the blinded eyes of those superstitious people who profess to and who do, some of them, believe in the efficacy of prayer.

Never before has the world seen such a suitable occasion for a proper test of the power of prayer. A great and good man, our chosen ruler, in the peace and quiet of the whole land, with everything in the midst of plenty and prosperity, is shot down by a cold-blooded assassin, a disappointed office-seeker, a religious fanatic, who has hounded his steps for days, for the purpose of taking his life.

The monster has at last obtained his long-sought opportunity, and the President falls mortally wounded. The wires soon flashed the dreadful news over the civilized world, and a wail of anguish arose from millions of grief-stricken hearts. While the rational precaution of securing the immediate services of the best physicians of the land was not neglected, yet Christendom began at once to assail the battlements of heaven with petitions for the wounded man's recovery. During the eighty days that the President lingered and battled with the destroyer, a combined appeal such as was never bofere put forth ascended to the throne or grace. For eighty days millions of Christians prayed, and at a moderate computation over ten billions of prayers were offered up.

Now, the Bible says: "Ask, and ye shall receive." "The prayer of faith shall save the sick." "Whatsoever you ask in my name believing you shall receive, it shall be granted unto you." James v, 14-18 says: "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up. . . . The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain, and it rained not on the earth for the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit." Matt. xvii, 20: "If ye hav faith as a grain of mustard seed ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible with you." See also Matt xvi, 21, 22. "And all things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive."

Can any honest man pretend to say that the deity ever paid the slightest attention to these ten billion petitions? The autopsy made showed that a mortal wound had been inflicted, and that only careful nursing and constant medical skill and attention kept life lasting through a gradual ebb of the tide day after day, until the end came. Here then was the supreme moment for a test of prayer. It cannot be said that these billions of prayers were not offered up in faith; everybody, save, perhaps, his physicians and nearest relativs, was sure of his recovery; and as the President would rally, the religious and even the secular press would teem with congratulations that the prayers of the people were being answered. The people were hopeful, even sanguin, and it is folly to say they did not hav faith as a grain of mustard seed. Why, then, did not this prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God raise the President up on Monday, Sept. 19, 1881, after all had given up hope, and he was pronounced gone by his attendants? Had he risen up, sound and well, on that day, could any one say that a miracle had not been performed, and that prayer had not been indisputably answered? Why did not God answer prayer, demonstrate his power and the truth of Christianity, and forever close the mouths of the cavilers by doing a deed not only asked by millions of his children, but which was inherently right, and ought to hav been done anyhow? The Christian replies, "It was the will of God that the President should die, in spite of our prayers."

What, then, was the use of prayer? Did it avail anything? Did not the case progress and terminate precisely as it would hav done if these billions of prayers had been curses instead? If the President had not received a mortal wound and his physicians had healed him according to the teachings of modern science, and not of James's prayer and oil recipe, would not Christendom hav exulted over the remarkable answer to prayer given in this case, and taunted Infidelity that it was put to shame?

It is now known that human skill could not hav saved him; therefore the fact that he did die, when the Christian prayer-answering God could and should hav restored him, is proof positiv that prayer has no efficacy, and that the supreme being acts only through laws which are fixed and irrevocable, because he cannot do otherwise and be a god at all.

Has the Christian God no laws, will, or purpose of his own? Does he change his devices to suit the wishes of mankind, an infinitesimal part of his creation?

If it was the will of deity that President Garfield should recover, how would prayer induce him to do what he had already determined to do? If, on the other hand, it was his will that the President should die, as it now appears it was, would prayer force him to change his purposes? Nature, and nature's laws, which are God, answer no.

Let superstition therefore discard its folly, and cease to proclaim through its ministers the exploded fallacy that prayer ever made a hair of man's head grow or fall, ever grew a blade of grass, ever formed a drop of rain, ever moved a grain of sand the thousandth of an inch, or added one moment to the life of a single human being when nature issued her decree that death must come. The President's death, therefore, has been instrumental in accomplishing the good end of showing up conclusivly that prayer is a waste of time and breath, a delusion and a snare, a relic of barbarism and superstition, unworthy an enlightened people. OPEN LETTER TO ELMINA.

ARROWSMITH, ILL., Oct. 12, 1881.

FRIEND ELMINA: Although I am not personally known to you, your being one of the world's great reformers has acquainted me with you. The love for humanity that has so long been overflowing from your heart has entered through the channels of sympathy into my heart and filled up the entire orthodox vacuum. I send you ninety cents for the "Darwin's" and "John's Way." I want to present them to my wife. I hav tried many ways to get her to read Infidel philosophy, but to no avail. She is particularly fond of a romance, especially if it has a great amount of orthodox God about it—one of those kind where the novelist imagins some poor orthodox church devotee to be winning some stout-hearted Infidel sailor to the arms of the mythical Jesus. I thought how nice it would be to ingratiate into her mind the seeds of thought, hence the above order. I am not acquainted with the "Darwins," but knowing the good sense of the author, I hav no doubt as to the wisdom of the investment. We hav a loving little daughter, near three years old, who delights the family circle by asking the whys and wherefores of what mamma and papa are talking abont. I consider her questions the outcropping of a noble Atheistic mind in its infancy. Should she but serve her generation as a continued investigator life would be worth the living. I hav lately began reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, which proves to be a scourge with which you writers are dispossessing the temples of their cash-changers. You may rest assured orthodoxy does not sleep as placid since THE TRUTH SEEKER made its appearance as before. Hereafter, I expect to spend as much for Liberal purposes as I used to spend for church purposes. I hav a good number of orthodox religious books now on hand which I would freely trade for anything except more of the same worthless concerns. I hav little hope that orthodoxy will soon bare its breast to the shafts of common sense. The world has not yet learned the laws of logic. Priestcraft has taught them that if they listen to their infamous assertions they are listening to logical reasoners; but, oh dear, I hav not got the impudence to make an assertion without being able to back it by logic. Yours humanely,
W. P. KIRKPATRICK

OGDEN CITY, U. T., Oct. 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: No doubt a letter from this part of Uncle Sam's domain will be interesting to your many readers. Having heard the praises of Zion (Salt Lake City) frequently, I resolved to attend the Conference of the Latter Day Saints, so I rigged up in my best, and taking the 6:15 train on the U. C. R. R. on Saturday evening, arrived in Zion at thirty minutes past eight, went to a hotel and registered, then hied me away to the Salt Lake theater and witnessed the tragedy, "Willow Copse," which was well played by the Home Dramatic Troupe. The theater building is sadly in need of repair. On Sunday morning the saints, saintesses, and gentiles (all are denominated gentiles who do not belong to the Mormon church, or, in other words, those opposed to a theocracy) gathered to partake of the sacrament and afterward listen to the tithe-eaters preach. I did not get in until after the bread and water were gone. I took my position in the gallery, where I could hav a good view—and such a sight and stench! That is the first the visitor is greeted with. The building is well ventilated, but the stench arising from the persons of the Latter Day Saints reminds me of a negro meeting I attended once in Cincinnati.

It was in the month of August, and in a close room. In the center of the tabernacle I noticed a fountain, and I thought it would be a great deal better for the poor deluded people to put in a larger fount or a trough and put a number of them to soak. When gathered together they are the worst looking set of human beings imaginable; that is, the old set. The young generation are an improvement. I noticed at least two hundred women who hav the mug of a madam of a third-rate bagnio, and the men hav more the appearance of apes than intelligent human beings, all foreigners of the lowest. There are quite a number of ringmasters, or ushers, in attendance; they were kept busy trying to keep the small fry in. Two boys, about thirteen and fifteen respectivly, played it nicely on the ringmaster near me. One of the boys placed his handkerchief under his nasal organ and stepped up to the ringmaster and told him his nose was bleeding, and he wanted to go out, and he wished the other boy to go with him. After a little parley the gate was opened, and they were allowed to go. I was very glad to get out and take in a breath of pure air. After dinner I paid a visit to Fort Douglas, three miles east of the city, on an eminence. It is a beautiful spot, and commands a fine view of the city. Zion is well located; it has a fine climate and a number of fine business and dwelling houses, but far too many tumble-down shanties, which greatly mar the beauty of the city.

My old friend, THE TRUTH SEEKER, comes to cheer me once a week. I take great interest in the correspondence, especially Mr. D. M. Bennett's. Long may they both flourish! There are a few Liberals in this city, but they appear to be rather dormant. The trouble is, the major part are Spiritualists, and want to carry things their own way and giv those who do not believe in Spiritualism but little show at the few meetings they hav held, but I trust it will be different soon. I am glad to learn that Tony Comstock has waked up the wrong passenger in Mr. Wilson. Colgate will hav to use an immense amount of soap to get him out of the scrape clean. Success to Wilson! Yours for freedom of speech and press. E. H.

A SUNDAY AT PAINE HALL.

Being in Boston over Sunday recently, I attended one of the lectures delivered at Paine Hall by Geo. Chainey, whose name is already a household word among Liberal people. I had heard of his success, but was hardly prepared to find the success so successful.

The main hall was crowded with as intelligent-looking an audience of men and women as it has been my lot to see. Mr. Seaver, that veteran warrior for truth, sat on the platform with the speaker. Mr. Chainey, who is a young man apparently about thirty years old, was for a number of years a Methodist minister; he has the clerical cast of features, and if vested in ecclesiastical garments would readily now pass for either a priest or parson. But a far more illustrious and worthy mantle has fallen upon him, and the fit is to be classed among the perfect things. When Parker gave up the fight and was laid to rest among the flowers of Italy, men wondered when his successor would be found. Years hav multiplied since then, and many hav been the aspirants for the place, but none hav filled it. At last the right man seems to hav been by singular circumstances forced to fill it. Emerson says in substance that when a night star disappears from the horizon the world stands expecting to see another appear in the same place, but it never does, and so with the lights and leaders of humanity. When Parker died, who would hav thought of a prophet of religious liberty coming up from the Methodist church to take his place? Some of our Spiritualistic friends claim that Mr. Chainey speaks by the inspiration of Mr. Parker, but, be that true or not, it is certain that he is the great radical light of the day at the "Hub" in the estimation of the masses, and occupies a position larger and more influential even than that of Parker. His style is free, eloquent, and poetical, and he reaches what very few radical speakers hav succeeded in doing, the emotional as well as the intellectual in his hearers, and in this we think lies the secret of his success in not only drawing a large audience but holding them from Sunday to Sunday. All classes are represented, and the rich and poor verily meet together, and George Chainey is the prophet of them all. Everything about the meeting is secular, music, song, and poem, and the hearty applause which comes in often. It is also the proper thing for the "pews" to encore the vocalists. We need not giv an outline of the lecture, as they are published weekly, and the low price of one dollar a year must hav enabled them to find all interested.

We look for great results from this new movement in Boston. These labors of the past hav not been in vain, and the work and prophecies of the Investigator are being in a great measure realized. Messrs. Seaver and Mendum hav not only held the fort, but hav lived to see their man come and Paine Hall a training-school, out of which there shall go an army strong and valiant for conquest. Fully one half of the audience I saw were young men in the prime of life. The published lectures under the title of the Infidel Pulpit, are, I am told, having a wide circulation. This is good, and, judging from those I hav read, they are as interesting as a novel and far more instructiv than the Bible. When you come to Boston, friends, don't fail to attend, and if you can't come to hear, enroll yourself among the subscribers for the Infidel Pulpit, and thus in spirit, if not in person, constitute yourself one of its hearers.

INTERIM TRAMP.

SHERMAN, IOWA, Oct. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: At last I've found the paper I've been looking for for years. I am a German by birth and was raised in Germany. A brother of mine living here asked me to come to America, which I did, and that put a stop to all my Lutheran doctrins. While a boy I was compelled to go to school from the time I was six years old until I was thirteen. Once a week our Herr Pfarrer came to teach us the broad and narrow roads. At thirteen I was prepared for the first communion; it took about one hour a day for six months. But here is what I did not like: from eight o'clock until eleven was our regular school hours; then came our minister to put on another coat, which was altogether too much for any child; then from fourteen to eighteen comes another turn; every Sunday from twelve to one o'clock I had to attend Sunday-school. I never cared much for church or Bible or their teachings. After eight years of running about in this country I hav met many who believe as I do, especially in this neighborhod. FRED GARING.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Sept. 30, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Though we hav long been silent, do not for a moment fancy we hav forgotten you. We often think of the gloomy past—the infamous Comstock, and the Protestant inquisition, with its fines, incarcerations, and myriad cruel injustices. These hav become a part of American history—dishonorable to humanity, an indelible stain upon her otherwise glorious flag. Nevertheless, for a short time persecution may be, if not desirable, very important and beneficial. Persecution makes mankind think, reason, and investigate; and investigation and reason free both man's body and mind. Thinking Catholics produced Protestants, thinking Protestants produced Liberals, thinking Liberals produce peace, charity, love, harmony, brotherhood, science, progress, and finally man's greatest happiness. Persecutions produced Protestants, and Protestant persecutions produced Liberals, and Liberals are "the salt of the earth." True, some victims must perish, as did Salem witches and millions of other unfortunate beings. Still, persecution produces infinitly glorious results, by making man and woman do their own thinking, reasoning, and investigating. Reasoning sets the car of progress in motion, and it will finally be the means of making all mankind free. Paine's reasoning (for the time being) produced the liberty and independence of American reason, and persecution has sent Mr. Bennett around this little globe to investigate truth for all the nations of the world. May the result of his efforts prove an infinit blessing to mankind.

By the way, we hope that sister Bennett will hav no anxiety about her dear partner. Jesus had 72,000 angels to guard him. Bennett has ten times that number. If the pious ones throw him overboard, and a whale or tadpole swallows him, a mighty miracle will surely bring him safe home again. If he has an encounter with Yahweh and the devil, he will overcome and triumph over both. We will write him to bring home the following samples: A loaf of Ezekiel's bread, a Jew paddle (a species of holy perfume), the real jaw-bone of Sampson's ass, a few mummies of David's and Solomon's harlots, pieces of Noah's ark, Moses's coffin, bottles of God's holy hair oil, a vial of wrath, beasts of Revelations, a piece of circumcision, the devil's tail and cloven hind foot, and other holy articles too numerous to mention. He will be sure to make his independent fortune by exhibiting them to all true "believers," all lovers of "Bible curiosities," and the great majority of the American people. There is a fortune in it. Ten thousand clergymen are getting good easy livings by similar exhibitions and speculations; and afer his toilsome journey, poor Bennett should hav an equal share of the spoils and profits.

Now, we very anxiously inquire of each and every "believer," and of all sects and sectarians,

WHAT IS TRUTH?

Truth is what all mankind desire to know;
But how to find it? whither must they go?
Go! To that most true—that never erring rule,
Natural philosophy—reason's school.
Study the sciences in early youth,
Use common sense, or never find the truth.
Read Bennett's answer to learn'd brother Mair,
Truth in TRUTH SEEKER in a nutshell there.

Bible "creation" science proves not true,
But all formation is the perfect view.
So for one moment let us, if we can,
Conceive the origin of worlds and man.
Thunder and lightning! raging, roaring fire!
The universe one grand funereal pyre.
Self-forming suns. From suns to systems hurled!
Producing each and every shining world!
Often before (perhaps) dissolved by fire!
Often may be a grand funereal pyre.

Without beginning—and it never ends—
Matter's unceasing evolution sends
Germs, from all nature with great forces hurls
The glowing centers of all future worlds.
Each has its growth, perfection, and decay.
Like man, they all in time must pass away.
Thus are produced all worlds and man,
By evolution's matchless plan.
By evolution yet mankind will be
From heathen creeds and superstition free.
This logic is more natural and true
Than jealous gods of pagan—Christian—Jew.

The infinit grand universe has powers
To make men perfect as the stars and flowers.
Then let us hope nature's great changes will
Our highest aspirations all fulfil.
Decayed grain does the rich harvests bring,
The withered flower blooms again in spring.
When dreadful storms of winter all are past
Worms change to lovely butterflies at last.

If worms make butterflies, may we not see
Ourselvs more perfect than aught else can be?
When friends depart may it not be as true
That nature will their higher powers renew?
The shell is broken, that the man may go
To globes progressed billions of years ago.

Friend meeting friend in perfect worlds on high,
In dazzling light, where flowers never die!
In youthful beauty shining lands explore,
Till worlds dissolve, and time shall be no more.
May not the greatest work of nature rise
O'er wreck of worlds, to pure celestial skies?

Yours, for absolute truth, E. N. KINGSLEY.

AN IMPORTANT SUGGESTION.

JOSEPH, OR., Oct. 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me through the columns of your most valuable paper to urge upon Liberals the necessity of a radical reform in our school text-books. No Freethinker will deny that there are few things of greater importance than impressing upon the mind of the child correct ideas. Our orthodox friends are not a whit behind the Catholics in recognizing the great influence that can be exerted upon the young by means of the text-books that are daily studied at school. Except in mathematics, there are few text-books that are not, to a great extent, based upon and tinctured through and through with orthodox errors and absurdities. Examin any of our school readers, Wilson's series or Watson's "Independent" for example. You will find that in the latter about forty per cent of the reading lessons hav some reference to the Christian religion in a style calculated impress its great truths upon the pupil's mind. All the geographies with which I am acquainted are replete with the grossest errors, especially that portion of them which treats of the origin and early condition of the earth, man, etc. But for wholesale falsities and absurdities our school histories cap the climax. I hav examined several, and know of no universal history for schools that does not accept the scripture account of the creation, fall of man, flood story, confusion of tongues, etc.

For instance, in Willard's "Universal History," on page 38, the pupil reads; "We believe that God, to suit his own wise purposes, miraculously changed the color and structure of some of the first descendants of Noah." On page 35 he reads, "The scripture account of this awful event (the flood) is confirmed by the researches and discoveries of those who hav examined the structure of the earth." And page after page of the same kind. I believe it almost impossible to overestimate the benefit resulting, could we hav a text-book on universal history written by a Parton, a physical geography edited by a Denton, and a series of school readers compiled by our Elmina or a Miss Wixon.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, let us earnestly urge you to giv this matter a business consideration. Let us Liberals do all in our power to bring about the much-needed reform in our school books, and rest assured we shall thus knock out one of the strongest props to orthodoxy. Should like to hear from others on this subject. W. J. DEAN.

EATON RAPIDS, MICH., Oct. 11, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Visiting the graves of my uncle and grandmother in Kenosha cemetery, Wisconsin, I was attracted to a lot that had a tall monument and two headstones made just alike but marked differently, one to the memory of the wife of Louis Knap, that he had lost some time ago, the other for himself, all inscribed as he wants it to be, with a vacant place for his age and time of death (when it comes). It is an Infidel inscription, and I would like to thank him through your valuable paper for his independence and defiance of the clergy. I thought as I stood there in that beautiful place, for it is grand, overlooking Lake Michigan, what an appropriate place for such an inscription. My heart swelled with gratitude, but, being with a good aunt—a most excellent woman, but a Christian—I could not express my feelings as I wanted to. Being very much hurried, as it was late and we had ten miles to drive, I could not copy the words on the stone, but I took his address. If he should see these lines in your paper, and it was not too much trouble, I would like the inscription just as it is. Yours for the rights of man and woman, MRS. R. E. ATWOOD.

CINCINNATI, O., Oct. 18, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: You must not suppose that I am wild to rush into print. No. But where, I ask, can an unbeliever in theological dogmatism display his thoughts and principles except through publications of Infidel proclivities? I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER with the firm conviction that it represents my honest opinions, which I believe are founded on the naked truth as found in nature. Outside of nature I never stray, and as you well know that every so-called religion is the outcome of ignorant superstition in a greater or less degree, I, for one, oppose all its claims to any respect or one particle of faith therein, believing as I do that deceit and knavery are at the bottom of the whole business. In a word, it is a wide-spread cheat, and most of those who promulgate its visionary doctrins are quite conscious that the whole fabric is based on theory, sophism, and arrogant assumption. God and a future state of existence is their principal stock in trade, and whoever looks squarely at these dogmas, free from prejudice and bigotry, can come to no other conclusion but that it is the thinnest of all deceptions, and perfectly surprising how people claiming to be sane can believe in such unnatural nonsense. Nature is silent on all these questions. Priestcraft is the top and bottom of the system. The machine was invented, set in motion, and is still running in the interest of clerical puffery, droneism, and cajolery, with millions in it. They ever thirst for political power to rule the multitude and control the country, and make their dismal creeds and dogmas paramount over everything and everybody. They are a national curse, a blight to progress, and a useless expense.

As to man, while he livs, he is a live dweller on this planet, but when dead he is a dead corpse on this planet. No part of him leaves this earth where he was born, where he died, and where he goes to decay, and that settles the whole matter. Gods and future worlds are the veriest humbugs ever palmed on credulity. Yours, T. WINTER.

H. L. GREEN, THE CHAMPION OF FREETHOUGHT, AT KALAMAZOO.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: It was my privilege Sunday last to listen to a lecture delivered at Kalamazoo, Mich., by H. L. Green, Esq., of the N. Y. State Liberal League. Subject, "The Religion of Humanity vs. the Religion of Christianity." Mr. Green is an earnest, conscientious worker for the cause of orthodox-burdened humanity, and his lecture was very clear and logical. Space will not permit a digest of his lecture here, but it was rich in those commonsense truths, whose mission is to inculcate the grand principles of honesty, charity, and purity among men, divested of all the somber robes of creeds, beliefs, and dogmas. He was on his way from Chicago, on a lecturing tour through the West, where he had been in attendance at a Liberal League meeting, in company with other expounders of Freethought, among whom was George Chainey, of Boston, the second R. G. Ingersoll of America.

It impressed me as being a very favorable indication for the Liberal cause to see in our city newspapers, in the column devoted to "church service directory," a complimentary mention that "H. L. Green a prominent member of the Liberal League, will lecture at 10:30 A.M. on the subject, 'The Religion of Humanity vs. the Religion of Christianity.'"

Personally, Mr. Green is a courteous and pleasant gentleman, and his dignified manner and gray hairs command the greatest respect, even among his religious enemies. In a half-hour's intercourse with him at my office I became satisfied that he carries out in his every-day life those principles of Freethought which he so forcibly defines to be "investigation, and courage to giv expression to honest convictions and doubts, and perfect willingness to accord everyone else the same right." UNCLE LUTE.

Freedom.

BY WELCOME O. SPENCER.

Freedom at Yorktown, personified and visible to the nations of the earth, strode over the camps of the oppressor, and whispered hope and joy to her brave though weary votaries —Hildreth.

Sweet freedom, now touch our lips with song,
And fill each patriot heart with praise;
Still another hundred years prolong
With thy stars undimmed of ancient days.

To the brave and free thy hallowed name
Is their light and hope, though tyrants scorn,
We'll crown thee with stars; while kings in shame
Rule in the night, we'll rule at morn.

Thy footsteps so often traced in blood,
Long delayed, and oft in prison's cell,
And brought to the dust where martyrs trod,
And greater thy wrongs than time can tell.

Illumin now with thy radiant beams
The earth's vast space, and from clime to clime
Spread thy glory where the sunlight gleams,
Bright and golden to the end of time.

Oh, be thou the angel of the North,
Far as Russia's snows and arid plains,
And walk with thy son's still nobly forth,
Sharing still with them thy prison pains.

Swift plant thy footsteps where suffering slaves
Yet basely lie, bound by priest or king,
Be the light and power and grace that saves
The noblest blessing that heaven can bring.

Columbia, still bright land of the West,
Forever we'll keep thy standard there;
'Tis our chosen home, by heaven blest,
By thee, sweet freedom, made bright and fair.

Primitiv Photography the Divine Art.—A Pun.

BY E. E.

A mystic scene it must hav been when the world from chaos sprung,
And God, who had nowhere to stay, to the equator clung,
And climbed upon this swinging ball; then, looking all about,
Concluded there were ways and means, and he would find them out,
For making something like himself, no monkey, myth, or sham,
So out of mud he made the thing, then christened it A-dam.
And when he saw the thing so like himself could move and breathe,
He took a chunk out of its side, and made A-dam an Eve.
And ever since the stream of life through A-dam's race has run,
Replenished by these cunning Eves, A-dam's divine queer fun.
But when again God thought to make his likeness more to please us,
He did not try the dirty plan to manufacture Jesus,
But took an Eve without A-dam, or anything to hinder;
And thus we hav his second plan more touching, true, and tender.
But eighteen centuries hav passed—almost the nineteenth one—
Since he left his perfect likeness in the image of his son;
Since this unique, curious episode, photography by birth,
We see God's likeness everywhere among the Eves of earth.
Should he, as endless cycles roll, a third plan yet conceive,
Mayhap A-dam would be replaced, while God would play the Eve!
This would a great improvement be upon the primal plan;
Then every mother's son would be the mother of A-dam.
Think you earth's Eves would care A-dam? They'd take a quiet rest,
While all the little images clung to A-dam's warm breast.

The Conflict.

BY O. G. P.

As the golden tints of morning
Pierce the gloom of darkest night,
So the soul for freedom burning
Will invade the rule of might.

Round old Troy as a protector,
Grandly, proudly stood her wall;
But a stone was thrown by Hector
And her battlements did fall.

Science, Hector-like, is beating
Down the walls of blind belief;
Its millions are retreating
And its priests hav come to grief.

True, they make a stout resistance,
Priests and preachers minions all,
Call the law to their assistance,
Crowd us out of house and hall.

But beneath our banner waving
Proudly over land and sea,
We the road to joy are paving,
Where souls and bodies will be free.

TAKING theology as a whole, I reject but little more than thee does; only one sect, or a portion of a sect, as all the members of thy church do not believe all its doctrins precisely as thee believes them. I reject all gods and bibles as such. Thee rejects all but thy own God and a portion of thy own selected Bible, with its acknowledged one hundred and fifty thousand errors, which the British revision committee hav been nearly ten years in hunting up and trying to amend, and which, when amended, will be like the work of the American Bible Society in 1874, which, confessing twenty-four thousand errors, deferred making the corrections lest people lose faith in the god-book, which has been bolstered up for so long as the pure, unadultered, infallible, perfect word of the Most High.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

Book Notice.

AN OUTLINE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION; Its Causes and Results. By W. S. Bell. New York: D. M. Bennett. Price, 25 cents.

This interesting work of eighty-one pages embodies a running statement—clinched with illustrativ and compendious remarks—of the facts and surrounding circumstances whose procession reached that stupendous denouement known to history as the French Revolution.

It is the demand of the present age that the great mjority of things intended for popular perusal must be brief and to the point. The modern reader, cramped for time, and brought face to face with multitudinous matters for consideration, seizes readily upon information regarding a given topic which comes to him in an abridged but close-linked and analytical form; while he is for the same reason obliged to deny himself the pleasure of a stroll through more pretentious and extended volumes bearing on the same theme.

The work by Mr. Bell whose title heads this sketch is one of the most signal instances of success in putting a wide-fielded topic into readable and popular shape, and at the same time one in which brevity bears special sway. The mighty story of how the vast continent of the old-time French political and ecclesiastical systems sank, Atlantis-like, out of sight amid the swirling waves of what seemed to that realm the end of all things—even national existence itself—has been rendered familiar to the minds of those who hav given attention to the voluminous work of Carlyle and Alison, Michelet and Abbott, and other authors, but a condensed and reliable (and at the same time attractivly readable) form of narration is by no means so readily obtainable. And in view of the wide extent of ground to be covered and the small space afforded by the number of pages entering into the brochure under review, we think its readers will feel to agree with us that Mr. Bell has embodied the story in a ready-reference shape, which, while it is bristling with facts, is not by any means a dull statistical skeleton, but is clothed upon with eloquent diction and infilled with a stirring spirit akin to that of the scenes and days whose sauguinary details it portrays. The reader, as the work proceeds, becomes conscious of the long roll of the billows, as point by point the fierce indignation of an outraged and suffering people sweeps away more and more of what the first burst of revolution has spared—till the final catastrophe occurs!

Beginning with the assembling of the States-General in Versailles, by Louis XVI., in 1789, the author takes a backward glance at the years of oppression of the people by kings, nobles, and clergy, and the uncounted sufferings which hav at last resulted in the spectacle of the delegates of the starving commoners sandwiched between those of the so-called religious and the political powers of the kingdom in an effort to obtain, by and through parliamentary means, that which the tide of events is declaring that the sword shall eventually win. France was not yet free from the feudalism of the middle ages; all authority, wealth, and privilege were vested in the hands of three classes—the king, the clergy, and the nobles; everywhere the people met with only despotism; famin was reduced to a science, and the commoners were the only certain tax-payers—the two privileged orders of clergy and nobles paying virtually whatever they pleased, and no more. According to Van Laun:

"In 1789, the approximate number of the privileged classes in France is about 270,000, possessing three-fifths of the territory, which territory is disproportionately rich in comparison with the other two-fifths, for on it are situated the most imposing buildings, containing vast treasures of accumulated property in shape of furniture and objects of art, the gathered masterpieces of centuries" (Van Laun; vol. i, p. 7).

Agricultural lands were deteriorating under the take-all-return-nothing system of husbandry which was made necessary that the farmer and his family might liv and pay taxes to-day, leaving to-morrow to take care of itself; and the gloom of a hopeless midnight (which the pen of Dickens has so forcibly depicted) was fast settling down over the land—precursor of the red dawn of a coming national judgment day!

The author depicts this dark condition of affairs with graphic pen, follows the tide of events to their bloody consummation—which latter he declares to be their logical sequence—and points out the fact that the French Revolution was really the gradually matured fruit of seed sown; it was an evolution, not a blind disaster; it was not a sudden outburst on the part either of political enthusiasts or Freethinking iconoclasts—or both—but religionists and all classes of minds furnished their quota to the developing elements. A proportion amounting to 270,000 privileged persons had for generations back spoiled and taxed to the verge of legal robbery 25,000,000 Frenchmen; and gradually worked upon on the one hand by a new power which had (though often unrecognized) sprung up—the power of mind and opinion (born of the encouraging influence of the establishment of the American republic)—and on the other by the fierce instincts of empty-handed hunger, the many at last rose up against the few and swept them from the earth.

Among some of the best results following this revolution, as cited by Mr. Bell, were the abolition of feudalism, and the creation of a middle class of land-owners really interested, through the rights they held in the agricultural system of the country—thus increasing the amount of the crops, and giving food to the people. Van Sybel is also quoted as epitomizing the outcome of the movement as follows: "Freedom of labor, equality before the law, and the unity of state."

The concluding portion of the pamphlet is devoted to a cogent and conclusiv defense of Thomas Paine, and a brief narration of his connection with the French Revolution.

Those who wish to peruse a really excellent summary of the stirring events to which reference (in outline) has been made above, will do well to secure a copy of Mr. Bell's brochure.—Banner of Light.

Competent assistants in every store, private dressing and consulting rooms, and every convenience with female attendants for ladies. All our garments are the same, no matter at what depot they may be purchased.

IMPORTANT TO INVALIDS WHO HAV BEEN TREATED BY MEDICAL MEN AND STILL CONTINUE TO BE DISEASED.

I am happy to say there is a lasting hope for you. The system of which I am the inventor will do more for you than all the drugs in America. It cannot be gainsayed that more die of drugs than from disease. The present system of medicin is a mistake and must soon giv way to more rational means. Thousands of persons in Brooklyn and New York are ready to testify that my "WILSONIA GARMENTS" cured them after the most skilful drug treatment had failed. Medicin in acute forms of disease of recent origin, may be of benefit, and in case of accident it is quite right to use every possible palliativ; even poison, that in large doses would kill, may in such cases of sudden disease, if used with proper caution, be found of great value; but in all chronic diseases such as paralysis, rheumatism, anchylosis, asthma, bronchitis, heart disease, gout, varicose veins, catarrh, spinal disease, locomoter ataxia, and many other forms of a chronic character must forever defy the power of drugs.

The history of medicin is one that, if read with care, would strike terror into the minds of every thoughtful reader. The most scientific writers of the past and present hav all denounced the practice of medicin as mere experiment, and the thousands who die under medical treatment only too truly tell the melancholy fact. The infant is wrested from its mother's breast; the bride of yesterday the corpse of to-morrow; the laugbing boy, the romping girl, the loved and noble husband, the aged parents, all and each in turn are daily hurried to their end by the errors of drug treatment; and yet the people go on from decade to decade without ever making inquiry as to the cause of such a state of things.

I hav now, after sixteen months' residence in Brooklyn, proved that medicin is not only not needed, but that every form of chronic disease hav one common source or cause, and that the same means that will cure gout will cure cancer; the same that will cure paralysis will cure catarrh; the same that will stay bleeding of the lung will cure anchylosis. This very astounding statement must must strike terror into the minds of our regulars, who pride themselvs so much on their acumen and pretenses of diagnosis. These men only too frequently declare a lung to be diseased when that lung is in perfect condition. Then how often is it declared that the heart is enlarged or fat, or its valves indurated, or some other such wild statement, only to frighten the poor victim into an ever-changing course of medicin—mercury to-day, chloral hydrate to-morrow, belladonna next day, and so on, week by week, year by year, until the poor patient becomes a walking drug store, and then dropping into an early grave.

Now, to obviate all this diagnostic nonsense, I hav come to the rescue of these poor invalids, and tell them plainly that there is but one cause for disease, and consequently one means of cure.

ONE DISEASE! ONE CURE!

The fact being that there is but one disease, no matter what form it may take, and it is only by and through the quackery of the schools of medicin that diseases and their cure hav been so multiplied, we now know the want of nervous force precedes a languid circulation or the want or equilibrium in the circulatory system; in a word, the blood is the life, and electricity the equalizer of all our forces, so that if we can by any means infuse magnetism into the human organism soothingly and gently we shall thereby attain to a natural state of existence and death shall only be the result of nature's inevitable law, instead of the early deaths amid racking pains, superinduced by the introduction of poisonous drugs and quack nostrums dispensed indiscriminately by empirics and the schoolmen of our colleges, but amid all this there is a hope for every invalid, and that hope is centered on nature's universal remedy—magnetism.

Before window glass was invented the only lighting media for our houses in the daytime were holes in the structure for the poor, or frame work of horn for the rich. The man who invented glass did not invent light, but only a medium by which it might be transferred. Just so with the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC BELT. WM. WILSON did not invent magnetism, but only a means whereby it may be accumulated and transfused through the animal economy of man.

WM. WILSON pretends to no secret as in quack nostrums, but freely and proudly discloses to every one the principles of his invention, so that all ingenius persons may for themselvs construct their own Magnetic Belts, the only question being whether they would waste their time and money instead of purchasing the appliances made by the aid of valuable machinery and constructed on scientific principles. I know only too well that the doctors will try to crush me for having dared to teach them their business. This some of them hav already done, first by inducing the internal revenue officers to place a tax on my garments; failing in this, I hav fought the government and won my case (although at the cost of three thousand dollars), yet I won in opposition to these doctors. But another move must be made thought they. A happy thought. Let us go to Anthony Comstock, get him to write a letter to a large number of persons given as reference, pretend the certificates of WILSON are false, malign him in a circular letter, break the people's confidence in his goods, and thus we can close him up. Well done, says doctor number two, and the thing was done. Comstock was imposed upon, as I hav now every reason to believe, in fact from the first I thought such was the case, and so wrote to Comstock the following letter asking for the names of the persons who had thus given him the information, but those persons being doctors Anthony Comstock dare not disclose their names; it was left to me to ferret that out, which I hav done, and confronted several of them, two of them who went to the fore, and others who acted as stool pigeons in the matter.

Here is the letter I wrote to Anthony Comstock:

WILLIAM WILSON'S LETTER TO COMSTOCK.

465 FULTON ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—I was surprised this morning to find in my consulting rooms many of my former patients, each bringing me a circular letter received from you, a copy of which is inclosed herewith. With this each handed me a copy of their replies to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon. I would take it as a favor if you would giv me the names of the informants to whom you refer. They are amenable to prosecution, and it may become my duty to institute proceedings against them. It will giv me pleasure to afford you convincing proof of my position, and of the nature and benefit of my appliances as a curativ agent. I believe my services in this respect will be found to be such as to commend me to universal approval as a public benefactor. Mention is made in your letter in reference to my name. Allow me to refer you to the Brooklyn directory, where you will find an advertisment of mine and my name and address in full.

I hav inclosed one of my blank checks (not for use). You will see my name printed on the end. As to my having been a cabinetmaker, upon that fact I build my glory, in not only having earned an honest livelihood, but to hav won the respect of all honest men with whom I hav come in contact, until to-day I stand in the proud position as the inventor of a system destined to overthrow the pernicious practice of drugging humanity. I understand fully the penalties I hav to bear for having dared to teach medical men their business. Do you not know that all great inventions and improvements ever emanate from persons whose walks in life hav been totally distinct from that in which such inventions were likely to spring? My discovery of the real nature of nerve fluid and blood composition must revolutionize the practice of medicin. That being the case, hav I not cause to be proud of once having been a cabinetmaker? If a rail splitter may become a President, and our now President not being ashamed of having once conducted a barge, why should William Wilson be ashamed of having been a cabinetmaker?

Hoping that you may pay a visit to my establishment, and there see for yourself the result of my labor, I remain,

Respectfully yours, WILLIAM WILSON.

P. S.—I intend to publish all letters sent to me, being copies of those sent to you, and will take it a favor if you will forward all letters sent you FOR OR AGAINST me. The following paragraph, cut from one of my advertisments, may be of interest to you:

My difficulty is that many persons will become rotten with disease, will swallow medicin enough to float a steamship, and rub in liniments and ointments enough to tan the skin till it becomes like the sail of a ship; and then, hearing of my marvelous cures, will expect, on putting on my goods, to jump into new life in two or three months. This, in most cases, is an impossibility, and persons governed by such expectations had better not waste their time or my own in calling upon me.

With respect to the names given below, a few words of explanation should be given. I hav not studied cases to suit my purpose, but hav taken each one seriatim, not knowing or caring what report may be supplied on application to the persons therein named, knowing full well that to wear the WILSONIA is to obtain perfect health, although in some cases it may take as many weeks to effect a change as it does hours in other cases. But it never has failed, and never can, when the instructions given are followed out.

Now, citizens, read the letters sent to Anthony Comstock in answer to the libelous letter; say, then, am I not cruelly injured by Anthony Comstock? Why did he not make inquiry before he wrote such a letter? I will giv to any one $5,000 for one case where I hav ever deceived a single person. I always, in my pamphlets, tell persons what are my proportions of cures, and giv the names of persons who wear my goods, not caring what the persons say whom others may apply to.

READ THE FOLLOWING DESCRIPTION OF THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS.

Electricity as a curativ agent has long been recognized by the faculty. In fact, from the time of Galen, through every decade, this marvelous agent has attracted the attention of all thinking men; but thinking and acting are distinct characteristics; therefore, while thousands of medical men hav decided that electricity was the one thing needed as a direct means of cure, yet the bigotry of the schools of medicin has ever prevented the introduction of anything that did not correspond with the preconceived notions of those who gloried in the names of professors, but in such pride of position dared not relinquish their glory. And thus it is that thousands hav been compelled to swallow the abominations of our drug stores through hundreds of years, and hav as a result, gone to an early grave. The methods by which electricity has been applied are numbered by the thousand—batteries of various kinds, electric machines, electric belts, electric disks, electric garters, electric rings, electric medals. Then we hav had magnetic belts in dozens of designs, all intended to produce and maintain a current of magnetism in the blood, by which process alone can the blood be continued in a perfect state of circulation. All these appliances do possess valuable properties, but the great trouble ever present was the want of continuity on the one hand, and an absence of perfect ventilation on the other. Not only so but yet another want in all these was a means to keep back the electricity of the body so that by a conservation of forces we could use over and over again the waste nerve force which would be otherwise thrown out into the atmosphere. This I hav succeeded in doing by encasing my garments with an impervious tissue such as oil silk, gutta percha, or any other non-conductor of electricity, but by preference I use gutta percha as the best non-conductor known; also that any two pieces of metal of different molecular construction must of necessity, when brought in contact where heat and moisture can ramify between them, such impact of metals must produce an electro-galvanic action. This I hav done in a variety of ways. By my first patent I used disks of copper and zinc attached to the magnets, and next I placed ribbons of copper and zinc with chemical calico between them to absorb the moisture of the body, but after many trials I hav proved my present method the most effectual means ever adopted by mankind in any part of the world for the production of continuous magnetic action.

Therefore, I am in a position to say that never in the history of the world has such a perfect magnetic garment been produced, embracing the following requisits:

First—Non-contact with the skin.

Second—Constancy of current unimpeded.

Third—Capability of being washed and cleansed.

Fourth—Perfect ventilation, whereby the moist vapors of the body are ever eliminated.

This is a most important point, and upon which I feel the greatest possible pride, it being the desideratum in all magnetic body wear, and the methods by which these effects are produced are simplicity itself, at the same time evolving a galvanic current, by the impact of dissimilar metals forming the ventilating openings.

NOTE.—The above points should be studied by every physician, and then, compared with all that has gone before, it will be found to be the most perfect arrangement in the world, as the following testimonials will prove, and be it remembered that these testimonials were sent to the government spy, ANTHONY COMSTOCK, who was stupid enough to doubt the value of my invention.

2 ST. FELIX ST., BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

A. COMSTOCK,

DEAR SIR: Yours just received, contents noted. In reply will say I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, hav never inquired about them. His garments were spoken of to me last winter, when my adopted daughter was suffering from a complication of diseases, who had been sick two years and more. Had been under the care of Dr. Smith, of Brooklyn, who said, after attending her for months, that it was a very bad case, and she constantly grew worse. I called on Mr. Wilson, saw his goods, heard his testimony, took the garments home with me, and my daughter put them on. She has experienced great relief. Has just returned from the country, where she has spent several weeks. She still wears the garments, and would not be willing to leave them off for a day. She is not cured yet. Don't know as she ever will be, but that she is greatly benefited I am sure. No one would hesitate to say, who saw her then and now, it must be the garments that did her good, for she took no medicin after putting them on. I hav a set of the garments myself. I would not part with them if I could not replace them. My little granddaughter, who was always troubled with a cough in winter, and had catarrh very bad more than ever last winter, has had no cough or catarrh since. I do not believe Mr. Wilson an impostor, but believe his invention has been a blessing to hundreds of suffering people. Yours respectfully, MARTHA MOXSON.

NO. 7 BOND STREET, BROOKLYN, Sept, 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

SIR—Yours of late date received. I furnished Mr. William Wilson with a certificate of my case. After wearing his Magnetic Clothing for five months, and being nearly cured of a loathsome catarrh of lifetime standing, with its wretched train of consequences, dyspepsia, heartburn, etc. Numbers of my friends, people of intelligence, hav been equally benefited, and, if called upon, will bear testimony to the "WILSONIA." As to the antecedents of William C. Wilson, I know from Mr. Wilson that he has been in New York heretofore. I hav repeatedly heard him refuse to be called professor or doctor, but insists upon "William Wilson, House Carpenter." Your most direct means of information would be to call at Mr. Wilson's place of business. His rooms and factory are always open to the public for inspection, and the most critical scrutiny is invited. E. S. CHIPMAN.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Your note came at hand in reference to the "WILSONIA." In answer to you I may state I hav been suffering for years with bleeding to the nose and other troubles, such as weakness and general debility, etc. I called on Mr. Wilson last summer, and stated my case to him. He put some of his belts on, and, contrary to my expectation, I began to feel relief, and am now a well man, which was a great surprise to me, after having tried every remedy that I could get hold of. As far as being swindled by him, I consider he has been my benefactor, as far as restoring me to health.

I cheerfully gave him my name, hoping that it would do some poor mortal placed in the same condition I was some good. Respectfully, E. NILSON, 413 Bridge street.

September 13, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Your letter addressed to my wife has been handed to me by her for answer. I would inform you that Mr. Wilson has had the full and free consent of myself and wife to use her name as reference.

Mrs Robb has suffered for a great many years from neuralgia (eighteen years). On April last, when very low, I obtained the "WILSONIA," and from the first moment of putting them on she experienced great benefit, and every day gains strength; so much so is this the case, she is now able to go out and enjoy life, something she has been unable to do for years previous. Hoping this will satisfy your scruples regarding the "WILSONIA,"
I remain yours respectfully, R. ROBB.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

SIR—Your letter, dated the 10th inst., received. In reply I would say that I hav received all the benefit claimed by the "WILSONIA." Mr. Wilson has used my name with my knowledge and consent, and he has not exaggerated any statement made by me. I know nothing in regard to Mr. Wilson's pedigree, but I know this much, that the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing has done for me what medicin could not do. I am now enjoying better health than I hav been since the war, and I owe it all to the wearing of the "WILSONIA" Magnetic Clothing.
Respectfully yours, etc., JOEL E. CANNON.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR: In answer to your communication respecting the "WILSONIA," I hav to state that I know that my name appeared in the different papers, that I hav been a sufferer from nervous prostration for years, and I hav worn the garments prescribed by Mr. Wilson with great benefit without the use of a particle of medicin. I was confined to my room with my eyes for three months, suffering from Ophthalmic Catarrh. I am now able to be out in the open air. They are getting stronger every day.
GEORGE N. LAMB.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 13, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

SIR—In answer to your communication of yesterday I take pleasure in informing you that the certificate which I gave to Mr. William Wilson was true in every particular, and from my present knowledge I can fully recommend his WILSONIA to any person suffering from the complaint with which I was afflicted, namely, hemorrhage of the lungs. Yours, etc., MICHAEL MARRION,

MR. COMSTOCK:

Yours received to-day at hand about Wilson Garments. There was a time when I had no faith in them, but when I came to put them on the Goods did me so much good I can't but speak well of them. They hav been a great blessing to many others I know. A great many of my friends hav been greatly blessed by having these Garments, and to-day they thank God there are such Garments. I suppose I hav had two hundred persons call to see me about these things.

I can't say too much about them. I am doing business on Fulton street, and hav been for twenty-eight years.

I was troubled with dyspepsia for a long time, but I hav never had it since.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—In answer to your favor of September 10th relativ to Mr. Wilson, I beg leave to state that Mr. Wilson was introduced to me by a Mr. Berwin a year ago last April. Mr. Berwin informing me that Mr. Wilson was the inventor of certain Magnetic Clothing which he (Berwin) knew to be all that Mr. Wilson represented them to be. Having suffered very much from a rheumatic and nervous affection in my left foot, I was induced, through the persuasion of Mr. Berwin, to wear the WILSONIA SOLES. After putting them on I experienced immediate relief, and consider myself entirely well from wearing them, and gave Mr. Wilson permission to use my name as reference. Regarding Mr. Wilson's antecedents I know nothing, and care less, so long as poor humanity is benefited through him. Many of my acquaintances hav worn the WILSONIA, and speak in the most flattering terms about them. I hav always found Mr. Wilson a gentleman of sterling integrity, and hav known him to assist the poor and afflicted in goods and money.
Yours very respectfully, BENJAMIN LEWIS.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

DEAR SIR—Yours of 10th received. In reply will merely state that, as regards W. C. Wilson and his Garments, I will say that I used them and found them to be a great benefit—in fact a cure. I was afflicted with rheumatism so badly that I could not move. After applying his goods I found relief immediately. My name was used by my consent, and I will gladly indorse his Garments as a great benefit to all that are afflicted.
Yours respectfully, EDWARD W. FEW.

September 13, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—I received a letter from you to-day about the WILSONIA, which you coudemn wrongly. I hav been sick for more than two years, and I had fifty-six doctors trying to cure me, without success, and they did not giv me any relief until I put on the WILSONIA, which helped me to work at my trade, and now I am as well as ever. PETER LEHLBACH.

BROOKLYN, September 13, 1881.

DEAR SIR—Yours of September 10th making inquiries concerning the WILSONIA Garments at hand. In reply I hav to say that Mr. Wilson has my consent to refer to me. I still wear a portion of a suit of the WILSONIA Garments, and I believe with good results, having been troubled with dyspepsia and indigestion for many years. In my business relations with Mr. Wilson I hav found him satisfactory. Very respectfully,
J. H. LITTLEFIELD, Artist.
ANTHONY COMSTOCK, New York.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., September 15, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

I received a letter of inquiry and abuse combined concerning a gentleman of this city (Mr. William Wilson), purporting to hav emanated from you, or at least bearing your signature.

My testimony (to which you allude to and as published in the papers) was given unsolicited by Mr. Wilson, and I hereby reiterate the facts as published over my wife's and own signature. Further. I consider the WILSONIA appliances the marvel of the world as a curativ agency.

As regards the genealogy of Mr. Wilson I am not informed, neither do I care. Suffice to say, I know him to be a gentleman even though four years ago he stood knee deep in shavings behind a carpenter's bench, which, in my opinion, was and is far more preferable and honorable than striving to gain notoriety by defaming the character and ability of a superior, even though he be a poor cabinetmaker. Respectfully, T. DeT. TRUAX.
376 Dean street.

NEW YORK, September 15, 1881.

MR. A. COMSTOCK:

I received your letter of inquiry on the WILSONIA Garments yesterday. As to the merit of the goods, I hav found them to be entirely as represented, and I take great pleasure in recommending them to all my friends and acquaintances who are sick and afflicted, knowing, as I do, their real worth. When I bought the goods of Mr. Wilson I did not question who his father or mother were, or what his business was some years ago, but I did ask about the goods, and that proving satisfactory, I bought them. However, I hav heard Mr. Wilson refer with pride to his being a mechanic working at the bench a few years ago. His name you will find to your satisfaction, William Cotter Wilson, in the directory. I am very truly yours,
GEORGE RIGBY,

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—Your note of inqury of the 10th duly received. Contents noted. In reply, most respectfully say, I hav no knowedge of Mr. Wilson's antecedents whatever, nor do I think it matters so far as I am concerned. But of the appliance known as the WILSONIA I do know something about it from persoual and happy experience. For more than nineteen years I had been a sufferer from partial paralysis of my entire left side, and hearing of the WILSONIA I wrote Mr. Wilson to send some one to measure me for a suit. He did so, and in less than ten minutes from the time I had them on my body they produced a feeling that alarmed me. I called Mrs. Mansfield, told her I was feeling strangely, telling her at the same timr I had on one of the WILSONIA garments. Mrs. Mansfield insisted I should take it off. But in that we differed in opinion. She assisted me to the putting on of my top coat, and I made an attempt to get out into the park opposit my office. I walked two and a half times round the reservoir park without stopping, which for years before I had not walked more than one-fourth that distauce without resting several times. In the evening I walked seven times around the park without resting, and from that time to this I hav been able to walk from two and a half to four miles each day. I am an old man of nearly 70 years, and so supple on my limbs I can jump over my office table or any chair in my house. I know nothing of Mr. Wilson's antecedents, as before stated. I only know he has been the instrument of making me a well man, and for that he has my thanks and blessing. Sincerely,
JAS. V. MANSFIELD.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., September 14, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK:

DEAR SIR—In reading one of the morning papers I read your letter addressed to Mr. Wm. Wilson, also a large number from people I am personally acquainted with, in reference to the benefit derived by them from wearing the WILSONIA appliances, and would say I know them to be true statements of their cases. I myself am clothed in the goods, as also my wife. We hav both been greatly benefited by wearing them, and do not by any means consider either Mr. Wilson or his garments the fraud that you say in your letter as people having represented to you. You hav evidently been imposed upon.
Yours respectfully, FRED A. BLAKE

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.:

SIR—I hold in my hand a note, epistolary, of which the following is a copy:

"607 WARREN ST., BROOKLYN, 9, 15, 1881.

"Professor C. HATCH SMITH:

"MY DEAR FRIEND—I inclose letter from Anthony Comstock, Esq. Please answer the same as you are acquainted with all the facts. Yours truly, CLARIBEL STEVENS."

The facts are as follows:

Mrs. Stevens, to whom your letter is addressed, wears a suit of WILSONIA. Her two living daughters (one is in heaven), one son, Mr. Theodore Stevens, and a grandson, Mr. E. G. Vail, Jr., each possesses and constantly wears a suit of WILSONIA.

All of these goods hav been purchased upon intimate knowledge of their curativ properties. Perhaps my wonderful cure of paralysis (hemiphlegia) by wearing a suit of WILSONIA may hav influenced these purchases. These parties have received great benefit from wearing the WILSONIA, and they regard Mr. Wm. Wilson, "the carpenter," as a gentleman, a genius, and a man whose simple word is as good as a bond duly executed.

For evidence of my sickness I refer to my esteemed friends, Hon. James Watt, M.D., Doctors Bedell and Hamilton of Brooklyn, and Professor James L. Little, M D., of New York.

For evident proof of my cure please call and see me. I will show you the dumb doctor WILSONIA that gave me freedom from disease of the heart, softening of the brain, rheumatism in the right hand and forearm, paralysis, and a pulse that intermitted one beat in five or seven or ten or three, etc.

Further, I will explain to your perception just how Doctor WILSONIA effects this magical cure. To wear WILSONIA is to get well of every form that disease may take. If I fail to prove this, notwithstanding your uncharitable epistle to Mrs. Stevens, I will obtain from William Wilson a handsome gratuity for your society. If you will become a WILSONIA missionary to the poor of New York you may stay the evils of vice and test WILSONIA in a Christlike frame of mind They who evoke the law perish by the law. You will be no exception—or should be—to this fiat of Holy Writ.

SEPTEMBER 17, 1881.

MRS. SHAW, 325 EAST EIGHTY-FOURTH ST., N. Y.,

DEAR MADAME: I received your note yesterday, wishing to know as to my experience of the "WILSONIA" garments.

I hav had weakness in my back and loins upward of thirty years, often confined to bed for six and eight weeks at a time. I then used Davis & Kidder's Electric Machine, which partly relieved me, so that I could follow my occupation, but always felt the pain and weakness.

In 1876 I got paralyzed in my left side, when I was compelled to leave off work altogether.

In about a year my limbs commenced gaining strength. I could then open and close my left eye, but my back and loins never gathered strength. My feet and legs swelled almost to bursting. I was altogether confined to the house.

Having noticed the cures of the "WILSONIA" garments, I got a set at $108. I hav been now using them thirteen weeks and hav found great benefit. My limbs and back are greatly strengthened. I sleep and rest better than I ever did. My sight and hearing are greatly improved, and I think ultimately I will be cured as much as I can expect at my age.

I am 69 years of age, and weighed, when I commenced wearing the garments, 245 pounds. My weight is considerable less at present; my feet and legs do not pain me now, the swelling is reduced nearly to their former size.

My wife has rheumatism in her loin and leg, which prevent her from sleeping. I let her hav one of my pieces to lay on the place effected, which gives her great relief.

Such, dear madam, is my experience of "WILSONIA" garments. Yours respectfully,
HENRY SCULLY,
228 East 120th street, Harlem, N. Y.

CLEARFIELD, PA., Sept. 22, 1881.

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK,

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant came duly to hand, and at the first convenient opportunity I reply to the interrogations contained therein.

First. As to the merits of the "WILSONIA," I can only speak from my own experience. I was afflicted with varicose veins so that I had been confined to my bed for five weeks. I concluded to try Mr. Wilson's magnetic goods. The first appliance gave me great relief, and in three weeks I was able to attend to my business. I was also afflicted with asthma, and greatly to my surprise I was also entirely cured of that. In addition to the foregoing my general health is much improved, so that I am now ten pounds heavier than I hav been for years through the summer season.

The "WILSONIA" may be a "swindle," but, if so, I hav not discovered it. Swindles, in my opinion, are as likely to originate in Nassau as Eighth street.

Second. Has Dr. Wilson my "permission" to publish? Certainly, if the use of my name will do him or any one else any good, he is welcome to it. Hoping that the above may be satisfactory, I remain yours, frankly,
GEORGE THORN.

OFFICE OF THE MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE CO., 156 AND 158 BROADWAY. F. C. LILLIBRIDGE, AGENT FOR NEW YORK, BROOKLYN, AND HUDSON RIVER COS.

A. COMSTOCK, ESQ.,

DEAR SIR: Having seen your letter denouncing WM. WILSON as a swindler and seen considerable in the papers relativ thereto I would say that I, too, am wearing the WILSONIA, having had a paralytic stroke six years ago. When I first had the stroke I was helpless as an infant, could not speak for eight days. I hav been wearing them since the 25th of June. My friend advised me to get them, but really, I must confess I had but little faith in them. Had I known then what I know now, I would hav signed a bond for five thousand dollars if I could not receive the benefits from other sources, but what I would hav had them. I fully indorse Mr. WILSON, and do not believe him to be the fraud you represent him to be. It seems to me strange that you should hint at anything as to his antecedents. What has that to do with his invention? I hav several friends that look upon Mr. WILSON as their friend and benefactor, having restored them to health and appiness. Yours respectfully,
F. C. LILLIBRIDGE.

BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

MR. COMSTOCK,

DEAR SIR: I received a number of days since a letter from you, asking concerning the WILSONIA garments—if I had tried them, and if I had given permission to publish my name in their connection, and other matter which I cannot now recall. I wore them for six months with most marvelous effect. I do not care to write the details, but will giv them to you in person at any time, as I hav gladly done to all applicants, though my permission as reference was never asked. Respectfully,
J. H. BARNEY.

2,310 THIRD AVE., N Y., Sept. 26, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,

DEAR SIR: Miss Claribel Stevens hands me your letter of the 19th inst. for reply. I learned that you had addressed to William Wilson's patients a letter of apology and explanation, so that I ventured to request Mr. Wilson to let the whole subject drop. But, in your letter, you so utterly fail to rise to the importance of the issue, and so belittle the "noble cause," of which you are a recognized exponent, the first, knowing Mr. Wm. Wilson's high character for integrity and earnest love of truth; and, second, being alive to the necessity that a "public censor of vice" should stand before the people sans reproche, the question becomes hyper important; is it wise to pigeon hole the papers and relegate the issue to oblivion, as your letter, prima facie implies a desire on your part to accomplish?

Your will scarcely controvert that great men suffer wrong rather than do wrong, and that a Christian frankly acknowledges his fault. In the issue Wilson vs. Comstock as you hav seen fit to act upon neither of these, in marking out your policy in re, I respectfully ask you earnestly to consider the following propositions?

First. Is WILSONIA the greatest marvel of the nineteenth century?

Second. So far has WILSONIA cured ninety per centum of those who hav been the pioneers to invest money in it?

Third. Are the patients of William Wilson deserters from the great army of chronics, of which such men as Drs. Frank H. Hamilton, Agnew, Bliss, and their like are the officers? Deserters from "Ye men of high degree" to enlist under the banner of WILSONIA, the standard of ye "poor cabinet makers?"

Fourth. Has WILSONIA cured epilepsy, progressiv locomotory ataxia, mitral regurgitation of the heart, paralysis, varicose veins, prolapsus uteri, suppressed scarlet fever, consumption, rheumatism, pyæmia, and all other forms of disease?

Fifth. Is the great army of medical men at fault as to what causes blood circulation, and must their wiseacre idealism vanish as a mirage before the wand of a "Poor Cabinet Maker?"

Such, dear sir, are a few of the salient points in the issue raised, and I am certain the cause of true science will be conserved by a legal jurist in presence of the "Ermine" and

---

"GOD SAVE THE RIGHT."

If you are a true knight errant you will find WM. WILSON a foeman worthy of your steel.

And now, Mr. Comstock, please note the following; I put it on record here:

The life of James A. Garfield, autopsy facts and all taken into consideration, would, not might, hav been preserved, had Dr. Frank H. Hamilton granted my request, conveyed to him by letter in New York, and telegraphed to Washington. Had I the right to address the worthy doctor, knowing that WILSONIA would save Garfield's life? Let the facts say whether the doctor's silence was courteous. I hav known Hamilton from boyhood. My father, the late I. H. Smith, M.D. of Auburn, N. Y., was the friend of his youth. My grandfather, the late Dr. Goodwin, of Geneva, was one of the founders of the Geneva Medical College, which was moved to Buffalo. Dr. Hamilton has now on his shelves the cream of my late father's medical library, which I presented to him.

Dr. Hamilton's first step to fame was his call to the professorship of surgery at Buffalo. But WILSONIA was not to save Garfield. Hamilton will yet learn that it would hav saved his illustrious patient. It was not to be. God's purpose is declared Your obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

NO. 330 CLERMONT AV., BROOKLYN, Sept. 27, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK:

In answer to your communication permit me to say, that, whether William Wilson be a cabinet maker or not he has helped me and my wife and daughter. I hav seen what the WILSONIA garments hav done outside of my family, and I can testify that there stands not to-day a man on earth who is doing more good for suffering humanity than this same William Wilson.

You hav not got marble white enough on which to carve his name, and to lay your hand on him in the glorious work he is now performing is to lay the hand of the vandal on the ark of the covenant of common sense in the temple of human health.

I am his friend, for he has been mine, and I only wish, if it should be your misfortune to suffer some of the ills that poor human flesh is liable to, that obeying injunction of the great Master, he may return good for evil by clothing you with the garments you say are a swindle, and that you, like St. Paul, may drop persecution and become an apostle of the new dispensation of health inaugurated by the man who was poor enough to work at the bench for his bread. I am respectfully,
THOMAS DUGAN, Undertaker,
330 Clermont av., Brooklyn.

DEAR DOCTOR: My friend Jones, of Atlanta, certainly improved after wearing your WILSONIA. I left the city with him and remained several days. A patient of mine, a Mr. Ostrander, may call on you any day for a suit. I hav advised him to do so. Yours, etc., Dr. WILDER.

TOMBSTONE, I. T., Sept. 24, 1881.

TO THE AGENT OF THE WILSONIA GARMENTS, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

DEAR SIR: I hav been wearing your garments for the past two months, am still wearing them, and I firmly believe they hav saved my life. Previous to wearing the garments I was suffering constant pain from fibroid tumor on the womb. Since using the garments I only hav pains once in a while, and the tumor is greatly reduced. I BELIEVE THEY WILL CURE ME, IF A CURE IS POSSIBLE. Please send me a number of circulars.
Yours truly, Mrs. LEE RUTAN.

REMARKABLE CURE OF RHEUMATISM.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 3, 1881.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, ESQ.,

DEAR SIR: A few days ago I received a letter from you, and, owing to a little trouble in my family, I did not answer it, and now I take the first opportunity of doing so and reply to your inquiries. I may tell you that Mr. Wilson has my consent to use my name. I had been lying helpless to myself and family for three months, then I got the WILSONIA garments. I could not put them on myself; they were put on by a friend of mine, and, strange to say, after wearing them only ten days I was up and walking about, able to care for myself and family, and attend to my household duties. Therefore, I must say when all else failed the WILSONIA CURED. This is all I know about Mr. Wilson; he has been my best friend, and has my thanks and blessing; may good luck attend him and his. Good work will always prosper. I remain yours, etc.,
Mrs. MARY PLUMSEY, 161 Tillary street.

REMARKABLE RELIEF IN CASE OF LOCOMOTOR ATAXIA IN ONE WEEK.

325 HERKIMER ST., BROOKLYN, Oct. 10, 1881.

Prof. JAMES A. CARMICHAEL.

DEAR FRIEND: I did not see you last week when I called for those garments Mr. Wm. Wilson was so generous in presenting to me, through your kind influence. I hav had the garments on one week, and I experience quite a perceptible benefit. This to me is very encouraging. In one month I believe others will notice my improvement. I am not able to jump over a table yet, but I hav no doubt but that I will in less than a year. I must acknowledge here that I hav received more permanent benefit in the past one week than I hav in all former experience with physicians. If these garments restore me to activity, which I hav no doubt of, I shall feel it my duty to proclaim to the public, personally or otherwise, what I know about the virtues of WILSONIA, in gratitude to Mr. Wm. Wilson. Very respectfully yours,
PHILIP H. O'NEILL.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is a progress that elevates and betters the race in this pushing life of to-day, notwithstanding its evils. Education is the remedy that works surely in the mass beneath our civilization to make part of it. The people are thinking, feeling, knowing more, becoming more capable of managing nature and managing themselvs. It is still true that "through the shadow of the globe we sweep into the younger day." Pessimism is not the philosophy of the future, however it may at times seem so to a sensitiv soul, touched too deeply with those evils that appear so gross because seen in the blaze of such light as never shone on the ills of older days.—Springfield Republican.

NO movement which has lifted the world, reformed society, helped in the progress of man, has ever been very popular. For a long time its supporters hav struggled with opposition; they hav been a feeble people; they hav been taunted with their small numbers—their little influence. But if they had the truth on their side they cared not; they went forward, sure of ultimate triumph. The honest man, the man who loves the truth, does not wait till popularity and success arrive. He is willing to share in the day of small things, knowing, as Emerson says, that when the single man plants himself on his instincts, the great world at last comes round to him.

"For to side with truth is noble when we share her meager crust;
E'er her cause brings fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just.
Then it is the brave man chooses while the coward stands aside,
Doubting, in his abject spirit, till his lord is crucified." —Dr. James Freeman Clarke.

IT was the wish and intention of Stephen Girard that the institution which bears his name should not be cursed with the blight of theology. But after his death Christians schemed and plotted until they succeeded in the adoption of a plan which involved a violation of the will in which the noble bequest was made. And now religion is taught even there, contrary to the design and express declaration of the benefactor to whose generosity it stands a noble monument.—Underwood's Freethought Judged by its Fruits.

THERE is a certain class of people who prefer to say that their fathers came down in the world through their own follies rather than to boast that they rose in the world through their own industry and talents. It is the same shabby-genteel sentiment, the same vanity of birth, which makes men believe that they are degenerated angels rather than elevated apes. In scientific investigations such whims and fancies must be set aside. It is the duty of the inquirer to ascertain the truth, and then to state it as decisivly and as clearly as he can. "People's prejudices" must not be respected, but destroyed.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

THERE is not a creed which is not shaken, nor an accredited dogma which is not shown to be questionable, nor a received tradition which does not threaten to dissolve and "vanish into thin air." Our religion has materialized itself in the fact—in the supposed fact; it has attached its emotion to the fact, and now the fact is failing it.—Matthew Arnold.

THE whole of modern thought is steeped in science; it has made its way into the works of our best poets; and even the mere man of letters, who affects to ignore and despise science, is unconsciously impregnated with her spirit and indebted for his best products to her methods. I believe that the greatest intellectual revolution mankind has yet seen is now slowly taking place by her agency. She is teaching the world that the ultimate court of appeal is observation and experiment, and not authority; she is teaching it to estimate the value of evidence; she is creating a firm and living faith in the existence of immortal, moral, and physical laws, perfect obedience to which is the highest possible aim of an intelligent being.—Huxley's Lay Sermons.

WE are clearly bound to wrong no man. Nay, more, we are bound to regard all men with benevolence. But to every individual and to every society Providence has assigned a sphere within which benevolence ought to be peculiarly activ; and if an individual or a society neglects what lies within that sphere in order to attend what lies without, the result is likely to be harm and not good.—Macaulay.

WE hav no doubt that the ancient controversies were of use in so far as they served to exercise the faculties of disputants, for there is no controversy so idle that it may not be of use in this way. But when we look for something more, for something which adds to the comforts or alleviates the calamities of the human race, we are forced to own ourselvs disappointed. We are proud to say, with Bacon, that this celebrated philosophy ended in nothing but disputation; that it was neither a vinyard nor an oliv ground, but an intricate hovel of briers and thistles, from which those who lost themselvs in it brought back many scratches and no food.—Macaulay.

CHRISTIANITY is not in accordance with the cultivated mind; it can only be accepted, or rather retained, by suppressing doubts and by denouncing inquiry as sinful. It is therefore a superstition, and ought to be destroyed. With respect to the services that it once rendered to civilization, I cheerfully acknowledge them, but the same argument might even hav been advanced in favor of the oracle at Delphi, without which there would hav been no Greek culture, and therefore no Christianity. The question is not whether Christianity assisted the civilization of our ancestors, but whether it is now assisting our own. I am firmly persuaded that whatever is injurious to the intellect is also injurious to moral life; and on this conviction I base my conduct with respect to Christianity.—Winwood Reade.

The oracles are dumb;
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the arched roof in words deceiving.
Apollo, from his shrine,
Can no more divine
With hollow shriek the sleep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance or breathed spell
Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell. —Milton's Hymn on the Nativity

Odds and Ends.

"THE missionaries complain of intolerance," says Sydney Smith; "a weasel might as well complain of intolerance when he is throttled for sucking eggs."

"ARE ye not tempted to gang a fishin' 'o the Sawbeth?" asked one Scotch parson of another." "No, mon," returned the other, "I'm no tempted lang, I just gang."

A METHODIST parson, who was a little "screwed," gave out his text thus, "It is easier for a needle to go through a rich man's eye than for a camel to enter the kindom of heaven."

A YOUNG lady fresh from reading the revised version of the New Testament, astonished her young man by asking if it was true that Byron swam across the *Hades*pont.

A COUNTRY curate recently gave effect to the impressiv narrativ of the denial of Jesus by his chief apostle, by reading, "And immediately the cock wept, and Peter went out and crew bitterly."

A YANKEE was being rowed across the Sea of Galilee by some lazy nativs. "You take the business remarkably easy," said he; and they said, "Yes, they did." "I guess," he continued, "that your fathers rowed in the same way before ye," and they said they supposed they did. "And your forefathers, too, I guess." Well, they supposed so. "I s'pose so, too," said the Yankee, "and, on the whole, I don't at all wonder that Jesus Christ got out and walked."

MIKE RAFFERTY told the priest in confession that he had stolen Tim Flanagan's pig.

"You must restore it," said his reverence.

Mike demurred—the pig was bacon.

"Do you know," said the priest, "that Tim will appear against you at the judgment day?"

"And will the the pig be there in ividence?"

"Well, yes, the pig will appear against you."

"Shure, then, I'll say, Tim, there's your pig."

SOMETHING IN THE BED.—Judge Pitman has a habit of slipping his watch under his pillow when he goes to bed. One night somehow it slipped down, and as the judge was restless it worked down toward the foot of the bed. After a bit, while he was lying awake, his foot touched it; it felt very cold; he was surprised, scared, and jumping from the bed, he said:

"My gracious, Maria! there's a toad or something under the covers; I touched it with my foot."

Mrs. Pitman gave a loud scream, and was on the the floor in an instant.

"Now don't go to hollering and waking up the neighbors," said the judge. "You get me a broom or somethinng and we'll fix the thing, mighty quick."

Mrs. Pitman got the broom and gave it to the judge, with the remark that she felt as if snakes were creeping up and down her legs and back.

"Oh, nonsense, Maria! Now turn down the covers slowly while I hold the broom and bang it. Put a bucket of water alongside the bed so that we can shove it in and drown it."

Mrs. Pitman fixed the bucket and gently removed the covers. The judge held the broom uplifted, and as the black ribbon of the silver watch was revealed, he cracked away at it three or four times with the broom, then he pushed the thing off into the bucket. Then they took the light to investigate the matter. When the judge saw what it was he said, "I might hav known, it is just like you women, to go screeching and fussing about nothing. It's utterly ruined."

"It was you that made the fuss, not me," said Mrs. Pitman,

"You needn't to put the blame on me." Then the judge turned in and growled at Maria until he fell asleep.

THREE FIENDS.

There was three demons came out of the deep—
Fiends that blighted the eyes to see;
That frightened the dreamer out of his sleep.
And chilled the heart with a sudden leap,
And numbed the brain with their stealthy creep,
A ghastly, terrible, horrible three.
"War" was one, and his sable plume
Shadowed a face that was cruel as hate;
He awakened the dawn with the sullen boom
Of murderous guns. Like a pall of gloom
Hung the smoke of his breath, and pitiless doom
His mailed hands held like a soulless fate.
Life was his meat, and his drink was gore;
Red to his knees he walked in blood;
Laughed as he raged down the carmine shore,
Raising his voice in the horrid roar
And shrieks of his victims, as more and more
They swelled the ghastly flood.
And "Rum" was another one, grisly and grim;
Crueller, ten times told, than you'd think.
Misery poisoned its beakers' brim,
Death eternal, and hate, and sin,
Want and woe—he poured them in,
And gave to the world to drink.
The victims were numberless as the sands,
Maiden, and youth, and hoary age;
The wisdom and courage of many lands,
Hearts of manhood, and dimpled hands,
They came to his death-feast, ghostly bands,
Weak fools and the strong-minded sage.
And the third—he came with a goblin smile;
Gentle and kind he seemed to be;
But the heart of the fiend was full of guile,
In his merriest moments, all the while,
His thoughts were cruel, his plans were vile;
He was the worst of the three.
At feast and wedding he sat elate,
With luscious lips he kissed the bride;
He petted the little, he pleased the great,
While he wrecked the home and destroyed the state.
With a sway like the rule of an iron fate,
That you couldn't resist if you tried.
Oh, woe was the home where he entered in!
He darkened the hearthstone that he stood by;
And faces pale, and wan, and thin,
Looked up in fear at his mocking grin,
And the victims knew, as they scooped him in,
They were hopeless slaves of the demon "Pie."

THE STENOGRAPH

Is a machine for writing shorthand. It is simplicity itself. Is very easily learned. Easily operated with all the fingers. Its writing is more legible and accurate than any other system of shorthand. The writing of one operator can be readily read by another. Ordinary shorthand requires the verbatim reporter to commit to memory hundreds of contractions and word-signs. Operators of the Stenograph use less than one hundred contractions. The letters are represented by dots and spaces—nothing else. To fit persons for shorthand clerks only half the time required to learn the best phonography. Six hundred letters per minute can easily be made, which is more than sufficient to equal the speed of the most rapid reporters.

which is the only certain and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. ☞Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact."

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warrant any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability. Those in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time, and often costs the life of a human being."

LAST year as much as $79,045 was paid as compensation to officers of abolished ecclesiastical courts.

A WESTCHESTER county clergyman prayed: "O Lord, help us in our attempt to eliminate thy word." He thought "eliminate" meant to explain.

THE inscription on the stone placed over the late Prof. Clifford's grave (his widow writes to a London paper) reads as follows: "I was not and was conceived. I loved and did a little work. I am not and grieve not."

THE New York TRUTH SEEKER maintains its high character. Its editor, Mr. D. M. Bennett, started on his trip round the world in August, in time to attend the International Conference in London.—London Freethinker.

THERE are one hundred and fifty thousand Freethinkers in Canada who hav votes. There are more Unitarians or Voltairists who hav votes; there are Spiritualists in Canada who hav votes, and all of these are opposed to the claims of Christianity as the revealed and inspired creed of a supreme being.—Halifax May Flower.

he made special provision for the contingency of the dissolution of the Established church. Dean Stanley has done likewise in regard to a bequest to Westminster Abbey. His legacy lapses to a hospital when the church of England's knell is sounded.

THERE is trouble between the so-called "boy preachers." The theological efforts of Boy Preacher Harrison were severely criticised by Boy Preacher Tyler, the blond young Ohio evangelist, the other day. The Ohio youth quoted with approbation a newspaper attack on his fellow toiler in the vinyard, which said "Harrison's theological efforts are a mixture of opera bouffe, Humpty Dumpty, and Punch and Judy." This impels the Cleveland Voice to say, "Ohio has not much to be ashamed of, but there are a few matters it is, perhaps, as well not to force too much upon public attention."

A METHODIST society in Mendon, Vt., has put up about a dozen good horse-sheds at the church. That is practical religion, and worth a dozen exhortations on "falling from grace" or sanctification. A man who will hitch his horse to a fence on a cold winter day, and do it for years, while he goes inside the meeting-house to talk about "faith" and "love," "sanctification" and "election," lacks some essential feature of the gospel of Christ. The world wants more of the Christianity which builds horse-sheds, pays one hundred cents on the dollar, treats the horses kindly, cares for the stock, and is not domineering in the family.—Vermont Tribune.

CONCERNING General Garfield's religious belief, a writer in the Hour remarks that the absence of any clergymen at the death-bed of the late President may explain a matter which has been well known in Washington, but of which the general public has not been informed. Mr. Garfield in early life was a Campbellite, and sometimes occupied the pulpit; but being an educated man, and abreast of his times, he, during the last ten years, read the works of Tyndall, Huxley, and John Stuart Mill. His intimate friends say that he seemed particularly impressed with the views of Herbert Spencer. There are frequent references in his elaborate speeches to the works of the scientific Agnostics of our times. But Mr. Garfield kept his heterodox views to himself. Lord Beaconsfield, it will also be remembered, died without any ministration at the hands of a clergyman. While paying all outward respect to the church of England, the great English Tory leader was either a Jew in his private belief, or else a skeptic of the eighteenth century type.

STATISTICS of the population of Siberia, which include in their estimates nomadic tribes and colonists, do not make out a large total for that vast and dreary Asiatic country. The total is only 1,385,000 souls, who are thus divided among the provinces: Tobolsk, 463,000; Tomsk, 324,000; Irkoutsk, 165,000; Yenissei, 164,000; Transbaikal Territory, 141,000; Amoor, 3,000; Maritim Provinces, 13,000; Yakoutsk, 112,000. Since the whole of Siberia includes an area of 10,700,000 square versts—one linear verst being nearly three-quarters of a mile—it is clearly apparent how very thinly populated this territory is.

MUCH animosity has been aroused in Canada between Christians and unbelievers by the recent seizure of a lot of Paine's and Voltaire's works in the Toronto Custom House. Collector Patton admits that there is no law to sustain his act, but declares that it was done in the interest of morality, and deserves the approval of all good persons. On the other hand, $1,000 has been subscribed to enable the importer of the books to fight in the courts, and a general agitation on the subject of religious liberty has been commenced, while the clergy are as vigorously responding with attacks on Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll, and Theodore Parker. Greatly augmented sales of antichristian literature are the immediate results.—Sun.

ACCORDING to a diligent French collector of statistics, the total number of recognized medical men throughout the world is 189,000, and of these the largest number possessed by any individual country belong to the United States. We hav, it appears, 65,000 of them, which is far in excess of the number for any other nation. Great Britain and all her colonies claim only 35,000; France has but 26,000; Germany and Austria together not so many as Great Britain, or 32,000; Italy, 10,000; and Spain, 5,000. Among all these doctors, 11,000 hav done something for medical literature. In the United States liv 2,800 of the 11,000; in France, 2,600; in Great Britain, 2,000; in Germany and Austria, 2,300; and in Spain, 300.

A LETTER-WRITER in the San Francisco Chronicle says: "At Minersville I had a long conversation with a very intelligent 'Jack' Mormon. Men of his class are 'neither one thing nor the other,' but are held in distrust by both the antagonistic elements in Utah. A 'Jack' Mormon is generally a gentile who has married a very attractiv Mormon girl and is too poor to get out of the territory with her. He refuses to connect himself with the church or to 'go into polygamy,' but pretends to sympathize with the Mormons, and gets along with them the best way he can. He is tolerated, and that is all. He has sprung into being within the past fifteen years, for at one time Mormon bishops furiously preached that 'all who are not for the Lord must be hewn to pieces on the highway.' The threat was not an empty one, but in a multitude of instances was executed to the letter."

THE great wheat exporters of Russia are becoming alarmed at the tremendous competition they hav to encounter. Hungary and the Danubian principalities were the first to appear in the Western markets, but the construction of a railway to Odessa restored the equilibrium. Then the American competition commenced, and has ruined the inhabitants of the wheat-producing districts of the Muscovite empire. Wheat is abundant in the interior—more so than for many years past—but there is scarcely any communication with the seaboard. The great military railways run right through the country, but there are few feeding lines. The roads and canals and the care of the wheat in transport are in as primitiv a state as when Russia had no competitor in the field. If a prompt move is not made by the government—which is scarcely to be expected at present—Russian wheat will soon be driven out of the Western markets by United States enterprise and the new field opening up in India.

IT is not often that Talmage gyrates anything good, but when he does we like to giv him credit. In his sermon on the press last Sunday he said: "As soon as it began to demonstrate its power, superstition and tyranny shackled it. There is nothing that despotism so much fears as the printing-press. It has too many eyes. Russia, which, considering all the circumstances, is the meanest and most cruel despotism on earth to-day, keeps the printing-press under severe espionage. A great writer in the south of Europe declared that the King of Naples had made it unsafe for him to write on any subject but natural history. Austria could not bear Kossuth's journalistic pen plied for the redemption of Hungary. Napoleon I., wanting to keep his iron heel on the neck of nations, said that a newspaper was a regent of kings, and that the only safe place to keep an editor in was a prison. But the great battles of freedom of the press were fought in the court rooms of England and the United States. One was when Erskine made his great speech on behalf of the freedom to publish Paine's 'Rights of Man' in England. These battles were the Marathon and Thermopylæ of the fight which determined that the printing-press was not to be given over to handcuffs and hobbies of literary and political despotism. Thomas Jefferson said, 'If I had to choose between a government without newspapers and newspapers without government, I would employ the latter.'"

THE controversy between the Free Religions and the Young Men's Christian Association in the State University at Madison, Mich., has attracted considerable attention. The following is an extract from the rejoinder of the former organization, addressed to the Young Christians, whose occupancy of rooms in the University buildings is very inconsistent with the American policy of separating church and state: "You claim in another part of your letter to be organized 'under no creed,' and state that the object of your association is one to which no 'well-disposed person can conscientiously object to lend a helping hand.' To settle this point, we can of course only refer to the constitution under which you are organized. Art. II. of your constitution is as foliows: 'Our object shall be the quickening of faith, hope, and charity in our own hearts and the promotion of Christ's kingdom in our midst.' Article III., section 1, of the same is as follows: 'Any person, of either sex, who professes saving faith in Christ, may become a member of the Association by signing this constitution. Thereby he or she is expected,' etc. What per cent of the people of the state of Wisconsin do you believe can conscientiously sign the above clauses of your constitution? Hav you been able to obtain one-fifth of the students of the University, as signers of the above-named clauses? You know as well as we that the University is supported at public expense, regardless of religion. Is it morally right, then, or in harmony with Article I., Section 18, of the Constitution of Wisconsin, to wit, 'The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed, nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent. Nor shall any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted or any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. Nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies or religious or theological seminaries' (Wis. Leg. Manual, 1878, page 37)—to compel assistance, as you are virtually doing, from any of the following classes of Wisconsin tax-payers: Jews, Free Religionists, Roman Catholics, Freethinkers, or Atheists—all of whom are dissenters from your belief?"

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.—Concluded.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XXXII.

What a fate! Now forever separated from all my friends—forever from the playmates of my youth! Ah, Clementine, Clementine, and from thee! Flung from out the lap of wealth upon the hard bench of a galley. Forgotten by all happy ones, now disgraced, among criminals. Instead of Clementine's charming conversation, now curses and mean jokes of thieves, murderers, smugglers, and highway robbers. Without book, without knowledge of the progress of the sciences, my spirit, left to itself, without hope. The fearful rattling of my chains now in exchange for the enchantment of music and Clementine's harp-play. No, so bitter death is not as this horrible change.

"I will bear it," said I then to myself. "It is God, and my spirit out of him. I hav not lost myself. I remain faithful to virtue, and carry, although misjudged by the world, that self-respect with me over the ocean which pure souls hav for themselvs. I hav had to leave only that which has never been my own; and what I suffer is only the pain of a body which hitherto has not known suffering."

So after long years my spirit won the victory. Thus I hav lost the greater half of my life lonely and joyless. I hav grown gray in misfortune. I hav never again heard anything of those who once loved me. I had no happy feeling any more, except when I, in my resting hour, upon single leaves noted down my thoughts, and could, through tears, look back upon the long since vanished paradise of my youth. Often, at the monotonous sound of the oars, my grief revived in me the beautiful pictures of the past. Then it often seemed to me as if Clementine was floating above the waves of the ocean and smiled courage to me like a comforting angel. And I stared with tearful eyes at the beloved vision, and felt re-open all the wounds of my heart; but I did not despair, and rowed steadily on.

I would sometimes hav taken all the blissfulness of my youth as the result of my imagination. But the sad farewell letter which Madame Bertollon had once written to me from the convent was, through accident, left me. I preserved it with veneration. It was the last sacred remnant of that which I formerly possessed. I read it often. In distant seas I read it, and on the hot shores of Africa, and always I derived indescribable comfort from it, and rowed more courageously on, always toward the goal of my life.

Thus hav fled now nine-and-twenty years; what are they!

Death, my often, my burningly-longed-for friend, is coming to release me. O my dear sir, and you hav had so much compassion for me as to make my last hours agreeable! Our spirits are kindred, and perhaps touch each other again.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Here Abbé Dillon laid down his book. "This was Alamontada's fate," said the abbé. "The history of his slavery I know only from the leaves which he has written at various occasions in solitude, and which, wrapped in a sack, with a tin spoon and a knife, made up his whole wealth. I learned from Captain Delaubin, who had long been in command of that galley, that Alamontada had possessed the esteem and, one might say, the veneration of all his fellow-slaves. He always was their umpire in their quarrels, and they obeyed his decision. Also the officers in the ship esteemed him. He not only was granted greater liberties than the others, but now and then he received better food. But rarely or never did he make use of the former, and the latter he always divided among the other galley-slaves. Was he reproached for that, he usually replied: 'Among us there must be no preference. Every kindness that is shown to me is only an increase of the misery of the others.' The chaplain of the ship sometimes approached him to convert him. But he remained stubbornly by his heresies, and that was his only fault. He seldom smiled. On the other hand he was rarely seen sad. He was without fear of death. In the greatest storms he rowed on just as calmly as in the quiet sea; and in the hail of bullets in the battle, when the danger was the greatest, he never even stooped. Some on that account considered him foolish, others bullet-proof. It was generally understood that he was from a good family. If this was not betrayed by his learning it was proved by the cleanliness and order in his coarse slave attire. When in the last fight with the Corsairs his arm was shot off, he said, 'Why not a span higher?' and suffered the arm to be amputated without a sigh. When he was led away from the galley all the slaves lamented his loss, and some of these rough fellows even wept like children.

"This is all," said Dillon, "that I could learn from Captain Delaubin about Alamontada. Everywhere he showed himself the same great, virtuous, manly sufferer, who, with self-reliant spirit and his eyes fixed on God, quietly and calmly walked through the storms of his life. So he appears also in his further writings, wherein a charming mixture of keenness of understanding and imagination irresistibly attracts and elevates the reader. I communicate them to you afterward."

We were silent. Our souls were altogether occupied with the misfortune of the noble man.

"Unheard of cruelty," cried Roderick, "to condemn such a man, unheard, undefended, to the galleys! The history of civilized nations knows but very few like examples."

"Alas, still too many!" replied Abbé Dillon. "Who does not know the martyrs of filial love, the good Faber of Ganges, who offered himself to the intendant of Montpellier to suffer the punishment of the old father who was condemned to the galleys? Did the intendant not accept the offer? Must Faber not go to the galleys where he lived until his beautiful deed became known in Paris and compassionate souls begged him free? Does not Faber liv to-day in the Cevennes in poverty,* while his fame as a hero is sung and applauded in operetta of Parisian theaters?† Alamontada was right. We liv in a barbarous age. Virtue is admired only on the stage and in novels, and in the world of reality misapprehended, despised."

"But, dear abbé," said I, "one thing yet we must know. Did Clementine de Sonnes come to Marseilles? How happy must our Alamontada hav been to look upon this so much loved being after so long a separation!"

CHAPTER XXXIV.

"When I," said Dillon, "brought the news to him that Clementine had hardly learned that he was still alive and in Marseilles, and had determined to see him, he was deeply moved. He remained long silent. 'Then she has not forgotten me!' cried he finally, much affected. 'Now I wish my life may endure only so long that I can once more see her. O Clementine! It may be only illusion, but perhaps the great ruler of the universe has regard for the nobler of our feelings. We know the nature of the universe so little. And as we notice in the terrestrial that kindred atoms always unite and attract one another, so perhaps kindred souls will meet again. Clementine, then I hav not left thee forever. Then my spirit will embrace thee as a kindred spirit in strange spheres. Immortal love leads the immortal spirit through eternity. And God dwells in jubilant eternity!'"

To see his beloved Clementine again seemed to the amiable sufferer to be the most beautiful recompense for all his endured trials. He looked with longing for her coming. He, to whose share had fallen so many sorrows with only so few pleasures, should also be deprived of this one.

He died. I was early one morning, called to him. When I stepped up to him he was already dead. Upon his pale countenance a smile was still lingering. He seemed to hav fallen asleep with the thought of Clementine, and entered a better life. I threw myself weeping upon my knees at the foot of his bed, and was inconsolable as one is inconsolable over a dead father.

A day later, after he had been buried, Clementine came. She was very ill, and accompanied in her carriage by her physician. She had directly to take to bed again. I was called to her. She was weak and emaciated, but still bore indisputably the traces of former beauty.

When she had learned of the death of the beloved slave, she lifted her weary eyes mutely, with a longing look, toward heaven. I showed her Alamontada's picture. She kissed it and had it copied for herself. Also I had to giv her from Alamontada's legacy his knife and the tin spoon, out of which alone she after that took the medicin and the little food that she enjoyed.

She spoke seldom, yet she appeared to be cheerful. I had to tell her only of him. Her eyes were uninterruptedly fastened on Alamontada's picture until they closed in death. By her express order the sufferer was buried at the side of her friend, to whom she was faithful unto death, and whom she, deceived by false reports, had long ago believed dead.

Now it is already more than fifty years since all this happened, but Alamontada's memory remains to me equally sacred and new.

Let us, beloved ones, let us liv as he did! Let us recognize as the destiny of our spirits their independence, their liberation from the power of the earthly, and in the hour of temptation rescue their endangered highness through the look upon eternity and the thought, Be pure, like God!

The Tomb of Fanaticism.

AN EXTENSIV EXAMINATION OF LORD BOLINGBROKE'S DOCTRINS.

WRITTEN BY VOLTAIRE IN 1767.

[Translated from the French by Avery Meriwether.]

CHAPTER X.

CONCERNING JESUS.

Jesus was born in a time when fanaticism still dominated, but he had a little more decency than usual. The long intercourse of the Jews with the Greeks and the Romans taught the rulers of this nation manners a little less unreasonable and coarse than they formerly had. But the people, ever incorrigible, still preserved their madness of spirit. A few Jews, oppressed by the kings of Syria and the Romans, imagined that their God would send them, some day, a liberator, or a messiah. That longing naturally should have been fulfilled by Herod. He was their king. He was the ally of the Romans. He had rebuilt their temple, the architecture of which greatly surpassed that of the temple of Solomon, since he had made a hill, upon which the edifice was built. The people groaned no longer under the domination of a foreigner. He only paid the taxes to his master. Jewish civilization flourished. The ancient laws were respected. Jerusalem, we are forced to say, was at that time at the hight of its splendor.

Illness and superstition brought forth many religious factions, as, for instance, the Sadducees, the Pharisees, the Essenians, the Jewish church, the Therapeuts, the followers of John, and later came the Popists, the Molinists, the Jansenists, the Jacobins, and the Franciscans. But no one at that time had spoken of the coming of the messiah. Neither Flavius Josephus nor Philo, who hav critically examined the many details of Jewish history, says that they hoped that a Christ or an anointed one, a liberator, or a redeemer would come. They had less need than ever of such, for they already had one, Herod. At all events, there was a party or sect which was called the Herodians, who recognized Herod as an embassador of God.*

The Jews gave the name of "Anointed One," "Messiah," and "Christ" to any one who had done them any little favor, sometimes to their pontiffs, and at other times to foreign princes. The Jew who compiled the reveries of Isaiah made that prophet, through coarse flattery worthy of a Jewish slave, say, "Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand hav I holden, to subdue nations before him" (Isa. xlv, 1). The fourth book of Kings calls the wicked Jehu the anointed one, the Messiah. A prophet announces to Hazael, king of Damascus, that he is the messiah and anointed one of the Almighty. Ezekiel said to the king of Tyre, "Thou art a cherubim, an anointed, a messiah, a mark of the form of God." If the king of Tyre had known that they had given him those titles in Judea, he would hav comported himself as a kind of God, and naturally he would hav been in the right had Ezekiel been inspired.

The evangelists never said so much of Jesus. Whatever he may be, it is certain that no Jew hoped for, or desired, or announced the anointed one, or a messiah, in the time of Herod the Great, when Jesus was born. After the death of Herod the Great, when Judea was governed as a Roman province, and another Herod was appointed tetrarch by the Romans, over the petty and uncultivated country Galilee, many fanatics busied themselvs with preaching to the common people throughout Galilee, where the Jews were far more rude and ignorant than elsewhere. In a similar manner, Fox, an uncultivated peasant, established a sect of Quakers in one of our provinces.† The founder of the first Calvinistic church in France was a carder of wool, named John Leclerc. Munzer, Jean de Leyden, and others also founded the sect of Anabaptists among the common people of some German cantons.

I hav seen the Convulsionaires found a small sect among the rabble of a Paris faubourg. In fact, all sects were originated in this way. They are, for the most part, the beggars who cry against the government, and who end either by becoming chiefs of a party or by being hung.‡ Jesus was hung at Jeru-

---

* That sect called the Herodians did not last long. The title of embassador of God was a name given indifferently to any one who had effected any good, whether to Herod of Arabia, or Judah the Maccabee, or the Persian kings, or the Babylonians. The Jews of Rome celebrated the fete of Herod up to the time of the Emperor Nero. Perseus said, in Satire v, verse 180:

"Herodis venere dies, unctaque fenestra,
Dispositae pinguem nebulam vomuere lucernae;
. . . Tumet alba fidelia vino." [1771.]

† Voltaire labored to conceal the authorship of this work He, therefore, in many instances speaks as if he were in England. The reader must hold in mind that Lord Bolingbroke is supposed to be the author of this book, and that Voltaire only adds critical notes. [Note by Translator.]

‡ This sentence is very characteristic of Voltaire, and forcibly illustrates his methods of working. Voltaire spent his whole life in a strife, trying to avoid offending the government and at the same time trying to break down the powers of the clergy. If he failed in the first instance it was because the salem without having been anointed. John the Baptist was condemned to punishment. But they left disciples among the lowest of the people. The disciples of John established themselvs in Arabia, where they still exist.* Those of Jesus were at that time very insignificant, and as soon as they made associates of a few Greeks they began to become better known.

The Jews under Tiberius, having indulged more than ever in their usual tricks, and above all having seduced and robbed Fulvia, a maid of Saturn, were carried to Rome, where they reëstablished themselvs by paying a big sum of money. They were still more severely punished under Caligula and Claude.

Their disasters forced the few Galileeans who composed the new sect to separate themselvs from the Jewish communion. They finally found a few followers with a little skill in letters, who, though flatterers of themselvs, still undertook to advocate the claims of the new sect against the Jews. This is why such a number of evangelists appeared. The word comes from the Greek and signifies "good news." Each Evangelist gave us a "Life of Jesus." None of them accord, except in the particular that all resemble each other in the great number of incredible feats which the evangelists attributed to the diligence of their preceptor.

The synagog, on the other hand, seeing a new sect born within its own breast publishing a "Life of Jesus" which would prove very injurious to the sanhedrim and to the nation, began to make inquiries about the man whom they had not, up to this time, noticed. There still remains a poor work of that time entitled, "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu." It appears to hav been written many years after the execution of Jesus, and about the time when the books of the evangelists were written. That little book is full of wonderful things, just as all Jewish and Christian books are. But everything is so extravagantly related that we are forced to admit that there are many things far more probable than the tales of the evangelists.

It is related in the "Toldoth Jeschu" that Jesus was the son of a woman named Mirja, who was married in Bethlehem to a poor man named Jocanam. In the neighborhood where this poor couple dwelt, there was a soldier by the name of Joseph Panther, who was born rich and handsome. He became enamored of Mirja, or Maria (the Hebrews frequently use an a for an i, because they never write out their vowels).

Mirja became enciente by Panther. Jocanam, troubled and desperate, left Bethlehem in order to conceal himself in Babylon, where there were still many Jews. The conduct of Mirja dishonored him; his son Jesus, or Jeschu, was declared a bastard by the judges of the city. When he became old enough to attend the public school, he placed himself among the legitimate children. But the authorities took him out of that class. Hence his animosity against the priests, which he manifested later at the age of his maturity. He had his revenge. He called them "a set of vipers," "whited sepulchers." At length, having had a quarrel with a Jew called Judas, upon some matter of interest to both, very probably upon some point of religion, Judas denounced Jesus, or Jeschu, to the sanhedrim. He was arrested. He wept and pleaded for pardon, but in vain. They stoned and then hung him.

Such is the substance of that history. The insipid fables and uncalled-for miracles were added afterward, much to its injury. This book was known in the second century. Celsus cited passages from it. Origen tried to refute it. It has come down to us very much disfigured.

The extreme passages which I happened to cite are certainly more credible, more natural, and conform more to that which happens every day in this world, than anything the five evangelists hav told about Christ. It is far more probable that Joseph Panther had a child by Mirja than that an angel came from the heavens to pay God's compliments to the wife of a carpenter after the manner that Jupiter sent Mercury after Alcmene.

All that which is now related concerning Jesus is worthy of no better place than the Old Testament and—Bedlam. Some people insist that I can only know the agion pneuma, the divine breath or sacred spirit which has never been heard to speak. They hav allotted that to be the third part of God—of a God who is the creator of the world. This spirit impregnated Mary, which fact causes the Jesuit Sanchez to examin his theological collection to see whether God himself took much pleasure in Mary's company, and whether he emitted, or whether Mary was equal to the occasion.

It happens, then, that Jesus was the son of God and of a Jew—yet not of God himself, but a superior creature. He performs miracles. The first one is to hav himself carried by the devil to the top of a high mountain in Judea, whence they could see all the kingdoms of the earth. His garments were all white. He changed water into wine at a dining where the guests were already drunk.* He made a fig-tree wither because it did not bear figs for his dinner at the end of February. The author of this tale has the honesty to add that it was not the season for figs.

He sups with the girls, and then goes to the house of the custom-officer. But it is related in his history that custom officers and tax gatherers are an abominable class. He enters the temple—that is to say, he goes into the great inclosure where the priests liv and where merchants authorized by law sell hens, pigeons, and lambs to those who come to sacrifice. He seizes a cudgel and lustily lays it upon the backs of all the merchants and their hens, pigeons, sheep, and even their oxen. He scatters their money upon the ground, and there they let it lie! If we are to believe the book attributed to St. John, they were content to ask the favor of a miracle to prove that Jesus had the right to raise such a racket in a place so eminently respectable.

It is of itself a great miracle that thirty or forty merchants allowed themselvs to be beaten by one man and lose their money without saying a word. There is nothing in Don Quixote which matches such extravagance as this. Instead of performing a miracle, as the merchants requested, he contented himself with saying, "Destroy thou the temple, and I will rebuild it in three days." The Jews, according to John, said, "It has taken forty-six years to build this temple. How can you rebuild it in three days?" (John ii).

It is a great mistake to think that Herod spent forty-six years in building the temple of Jerusalem. The Jews would not hav published such a falsehood. En passant, we may say that it is easy to see that the books of the evangelists were written by people who knew nothing.

All those miracles are somewhat similar to the sticks performed by the charlatans of Smithfield. Toland and Woolston treated such as they deserved. The best miracle, in my opinion, was that by which Jesus sent the devil into the bodies of two thousand hogs in a country where there were no hogs.

After that foolish undertaking Jesus began to preach in the various villages. What sort of discourse did he hold forth? He compared the kingdom of heaven to a grain of mustard seed, to a bit of leaven mixed in three measures of flour, to a thread with which we fish for the good and the bad fish, to a king who killed his poultry to celebrate the wedding of his son, and sent his servants to call the neighbors in to the wedding. The neighbors killed the people who came to invite them to the feast; the king killed those who killed his people and burnt their towns. Jesus sent for the first beggars on the highway, to come and dine with him. He saw a poor soul who did not hav even a coat, and in place of giving him one, he had him cast into a dungeon. Here is the kingdom of God according to Matthew.

In his other sermons the kingdom of God is compared to a usurer who demands cent per cent for his goods. We must confess that our Archbishop Tillotson preaches another doctrin and in better taste.

But how does the history of Jesus end? It is the same ending which comes to pass now and at all times for those who wish to stir up the populace without having the requisit skill either for arming the people or making them their puissant protectors: they end their days by being hung. Jesus was hung for having called his superiors vipers and whited sepulchers. He was executed publicly, but was resurrected in secrecy. And finally he ascended to heaven in the presence of twenty-four of his disciples;† none others in Judea saw him mount to the clouds. That was, for all that, very easy to see. It has made a great clatter in this world.

Our creed, which the Catholics call the credo, is attributed to the apostles. But it was evidently composed about for hundred years after the apostles. From this creed we judge that before Jesus ascended to heaven he made a tour around hell. It may be remarked that there is not a word in the evangelists about this; nevertheless it is one of the principal articles of Christian faith. A man is not a Christian unless he believes that Jesus went to hell.

Who, then, first pictured that voyage? It was Athanasius who wrote about it, some three hundred and fifty years after. It is in his treatis against Apollyon, and upon the incarnation of the savior, that he says the soul of Jesus descended into hell while his body was in the sepulcher. These words are worthy of attention, and from them we may see with what sagacity and wisdom Athanasius reasoned. Here are his own words:

"It was necessary, after the death of Jesus, that the essential and diverse parts of his body undergo their different functions; that the body remain in the sepulcher in order to resist decay, and that his soul go to hell to vanquish death."

The African Augustus was of the opinion held by Athanasius propounded in a letter which he wrote to Evodus: Quis ergo nisi infidelis negaverit fuisse apud inferos Christum? which translated is, "Who, unless he is an Infidel, will deny that Christ was in hell?" Jerome, his contemporary, was also of the same opinion; and that was the time when Augustus and Jerome composed the credo, which ignorant people called the symbol of the apostles.*

Thus were these opinions, beliefs, and sects established. But how could such detestable follies ever be believed? How did they supplant the silly rites of the Greeks and Romans, and even the empire itself? Why did they cause so much misery, so many civil wars, and light so many funeral piles and made blood run like water? These questions caused us to render an exact account.

union of the state and church was so close in his time that it was impossible to attack the one without offending the other. When Voltaire compared the founders of sects to beggars who cry against the government, he thought that he would strengthen his own position with Louis XV., and also bring the clergy into contempt. Herein lies Voltaire's greatest error of thought. The modern school of Freethinkers do not attempt to impeach the founders of sects, but welcome them as necessary allies in cultivating diversity of thought, and destroying the idea of a personal government, either spiritual or human. Voltaire, in decrying the founders of sects, did himself and his cause more harm than good; for the same arguments he used against Jesus and John the Baptist were turned against him when he became known as an innovator, iconoclast, and founder of a new sect, the Voltaireans. [Note by Translator.]

* The Christians who followed St. John are located principally at Mosul and near Bassora. [1771.]

* It is difficult to say which is the most ridiculous of those pretended marvels. Many people took wine at the wedding at Cana. What did God say to his Jewish mother, "Woman, what hav I to do with thee?" This is strange; but God eats and drinks with drunkards and changes six pots of water into wine for a set of drunkards who hav already drunken too much. What blasphemy, more execrable than impertinent! The Hebrews use a word which answers to the word grises, tipsy. The Vulgate, ii, 10, says inebriate.

St. Chrysostom, with a mouth of gold, said it was the best wine that ever was drunken; and many fathers of the church pretend that this wine meant the blood of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. Oh, the folly of superstition, in what extravagances hav you plunged us! [1771.]

† Did he mount to the heavens in a perpendicular or in a horizontal line? To ascend is against the laws of gravitation. He could graze the horizon and go to Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, or Saturn, or to some star, or perhaps to the moon if these stars had set. What is more foolish and empty of meaning than the words "to go to the heavens," "to descend from the heavens," as if we were in the center of the universe, as if our earth was not merely one of the planets which rolls in its spacious course around the sun and is only a part of the universe which they hav so inappropriately called the heavens?

* The reader can see evidently that they did not dare at first to compose such revolting fictions. A few adherents of Jesus the Jew contented themselvs, in the beginning, with saying that he was a man who was very unjustly crucified. The Christians of our day hav as unjustly murdered many good men. By and by they began to be emboldened. They ventured to write that God was resurrected. It was sometime afterward that they made that legend. One person then said that he went to heaven or to hell; another one said that he would judge the living and the dead in the valley of Jehosaphat, and finally they made him a God. Then they made him three Gods. They extended the sophism by saying that the three Gods are no more than one. Of the three Gods they eat one and drink the other, which returns water to matter.

They persecuted, burnt, and overwhelmed those who denied all this. For teaching such, a man in England enjoys a revenue of six thousand pieces of gold. In other countries they are even more luxuriously treated. [1771.]

The End.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One of Iowa's truest Liberals and most devoted humanitarians, Dr. John Brown, of Bismarck, Clayton county, died at his home near that place, October 3d. The light of his life has been slowly going out since last spring, though the months hav been free from excessiv pain. When I last saw him he was quite indisposed, but was enthusiastic in the cause of Freethought, and ready to do everything in his power to help disseminate its principles among the people.

His funeral services were purely secular, Judge Samuel Murdock, of Elkader, speaking upon his life and work.

Dr. Brown was a nativ of England and was sixty-six years of age at the time of his death. In his early life he was a very successful Methodist preacher, but long years ago he stepped up out of the dark valleys of theology on to the sunlit hights of science and Freethought. His companion is left with five children, all grown up.

Says the McGreggor News: "Dr. Brown was a great student and an expert logician and arguer. He was honest in his belief and died in a peaceful frame of mind. We were at his bed-side upon Sunday, the day before his death. He had then given up all hope of recovery and calmly awaited the approach of death. His mind was clear and undisturbed by any fear of the future. He expressed no regrets, and when we asked him 'What of the future?' he said, 'I settled those questions long years ago and am not afraid to die.' He left many things unfinished in this world that he had begun. He was eminently a kind-hearted man, and often went long distances to help poor people who were sick or in trouble. He was always the friend of honesty, temperance, and liberality."

Such were his virtues, purely human virtues; such his epitaph. "He was good and just to his fellows." He lived his life as best he could and died the death of the sage, unterrified by fear of hell and unelated by the childish dream of an impossible heaven. May surcease of sorrow come to those loved who him and yet liv! E. C. WALKER.

The Canada Case.

This affair of unmitigated bigotry has been productiv of much good to the Freethought cause in Canada. It has brought to the surface much intolerance and also much Liberalism. All the papers except the Toronto Mail—the collector's own organ—hav condemned the seizure in unmeasured terms, while nearly every clergyman in the province has upheld it. It has shown that the pulpit is as far in the rear of civilization and progress in ideas as ever, while the fact that the press is generally found on the side of freedom and decency has been emphasized in an unmistakable manner. One of the worst cases of Miss Nancyism is that of Archbishop Lynch, of Toronto, who cleared his church of the female portion of his congregation while he read to those left the blasphemous utterances of the "Age of Reason." The archbishop must be an old fossil dug up by the church party for this especial occasion. He certainly cannot hav read any of the recent works of science, or he would not imagin that the writings of Paine are blasphemous. Paine had a sincere respect for "God," believed in him, but did not believe in the Bible. The best scientific works of the day completely ignore "God," showing thereby less respect for him than Paine. But Paine has been called blasphemous for the last ninety years, and our poor archbishop doesn't know the times hav changed. Probably he died several decades ago and has been walking around since to save funeral expenses.

Mr. Patton, the brilliant collector who seized these works, says he had instructions from the Ottawa minister, but the latter now denies it. He says he was never consulted in the case. The inference, therefore, is that one of these noble Christians lies. Perhaps the fact that about a thousand dollars were raised and tendered to Mr. Cooke to fight the case in the courts had something to do with the minister's disavowal of all knowledge of the seizure. He may want to get some office again and dislikes to run counter to a public opinion so strong as has been manifested in this case. If the matter does get into the courts the Canadian officials may perhaps learn something about the equal right of Infidels to read their favorit authors with the Christian. Another reason may hav been that the Freethinkers threatened to print a Canadian edition of the "Age of Reason" and "Pocket Theology," which could be circulated in her majesty's dominion without passing under the argus eyes of men like Mr. Patton, the collector of customs in the interests of morality and "God." At any rate, we learn that the authorities hav dropped the books and the porsecution. We hope it so, for the perceedings were a disgrace to any country, especially to one upon this continent. The attempt was by Bigotry clothed for a brief time with power; its defeat is by Freedom, which ever wears the robes of justice.

A Bad Way to Sustain a Bad Cause.

The church believes in claiming a good deal in order to get a little. When any public man whose life has been good and grand dies, the ecclesiastical devil-fish throws out its slimy tentacles and endeavors to drag his character down to the church level. It appears to think that by proving a good man a Christian it elevates its own character. It would pull anybody down to save itself.

When Lincoln died his name was seized upon by the priests. His work had been heroic, his character was stainless. And so they boldly said, in the face of incontestable facts, that he was a victim of the Christian superstition. And about any one who said to the contrary they immediately began to lie. One of the men who was most intimately associated with Lincoln, and who best knew his religious opinions, is W. H. Herndon. He was at one time a law parter of Lincoln's, and often talked with him upon theological matters. He was best qualified of any to speak upon the subject, and his positiv assertion was and is that Lincoln was an Infidel. Such testimony was very damaging to the claims of the church, and as there was no way of getting around it, they began to lie about Mr. Herndon. One Rev. James A. Reed had a discussion with Mr. Herndon concerning Lincoln's belief, and, being worsted, began to write anonymous letters about him, of which the following is a specimen:

"Herndon is simply a low, vile Infidel and a common drunkard, living out on the banks of the Sangamon, where he stays, coming to town when he feels like firing up. He is a man of neither character nor force. Lincoln took him into his office when a young man, to kindle his fires and brush up the cobwebs. He read law with him, and claims to hav been a partner for awhile. Lincoln tried to save him, but found it no use, and never recognized him with any appointment when he became President, well knowing his habits. After his death Herndon then undertook to write his life and prove that he was an Infidel. No publishing house in the country would print his book, and he was not able to do it himself. By and by Col. Lamon undertook to write a biography of Lincoln, and purchased Herndon's old manuscripts and worked it up. Herndon had letters printed purporting to be letters from Hon. John T. Stuart, his law partner, and prominent citizens of Springfield, stating that they believed Mr. Lincoln had been an Infidel to the day of his death. These gentlemen gave me their testimony over their own signatures that they never wrote a word of the letters imputed to them, and that they believed no such stuff. But see my lecture in Scribner, where you will see the letters that proved Herndon a knave and a liar. No statement that Herndon makes concerning the character of Lincoln is true" (Daily Monitor, Oct. 8th).

As to Mr. Herndon's character, the Daily Monitor, of Illinois, says: "Mr. Herndon is an old citizen, against whose character, as a man, no suspicion of crookedness was ever raised, truthfully, and it is not to the glory of God nor the advancement of Christianity that his name should be branded about in the character given him by the outrageously libelous matter contained in the above letter."

Mr. Herndon is an enthusiastic temperance man and was when Reed wrote this letter. We hav no doubt he would like to hav had Mr. Lincoln a Christian, for he believes in God, inspiration, revelation, son of God, and the like. But being a man who preferred facts to creed, he had to tell the truth, which was that Lincoln was not a Christian. And for it he has to suffer the abuse of such men as Reed, who has not the boldness to even sign his name to his slanderous letters. Mr. Herndon denies all of Reed's charges, and brings as refutation the testimony of all his neighbors. If Christianity is driven to slandering such men as Wm. H. Herndon, then the quicker it dies the better for the whole world.

The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

To those of our readers who hav perused the book as it was printed in these columns it is not necessary to say that this is a very valuable work for reference and interesting to peruse. It has been said by many that Mr. Mair was the ablest upholder of Christianity they ever read, and it is safe to say that whatever arguments could be adduced in favor of Christianity were brought forward by the gentleman. But falsehood, however ably upheld, cannot stand where the truth is known; and Mr. Bennett has shown this most clearly. Under his sledgehammer blows the theology of Mr. Mair crumbles to dust. He has a very effectiv way of putting his arguments, and he never leaves a point in doubt, but piles proof on proof, mountain high, until the enemy is completely overwhelmed in a mass of evidence.

Mr. Bennett affirms all the propositions—we had almost said truisms—and Mr. Mair denies with what power he can. He brings to the defense of Christianity the best arguments that can be adduced. His letters show painstaking care and a familiarity with authors unexcelled by any layman. Indeed, few professional theologians could draw from the arsenal of the church better weapons. But he is met at every point and disarmed with a promptness that shows Mr. Bennett to be more than his match, and no less familiar with authors. Mr. Mair knows only one side, while Mr. Bennett knows both, and he has not failed to show that Christianity is weak and indefensible, founded on assumptions, supplemented by deceit, and extremely weak in the essentials of proof.

This work will do a great amount of good wherever read. All who hav read it in the paper will want it in book form to preserve, while for the new subscriber it will possess the added charm of newness. It contains 969 pages; price. $7.50.

We quote the following from the Seymour Times:

"The discussion of the objections to Christianity between D. M. Bennett and G. M. Mair, which began in June, 1880, and has been carried on through THE TRUTH SEEKER, is now published in a handsome volume. This discussion was very ably conducted on both sides. Mr. Mair, who is not a minister, did the best he could for a client that comes into court without witnesses or dates, or authentic documents, and Mr. Bennett is skilful in wielding the effectiv weapons that are readily brought to bear with such fatal force against Christianity and its claims. So the book is valuable to both Christian and Infidel, as presenting the best arguments and evidences either can present."

Around the World.

We hope there will be no cessation in taking shares in the Round-the-World journey which Mr. Bennett is now engaged in making. The expenses of the trip will be close upon $3,000, and the cost of the books, with their illustrations, will not be less than $1,500 or $2,000. So his friends who hav sent him away will see that many more names are necessary before the bare cost of the undertaking is paid. The idea is that the work shall be a sort of joint enterprise, the people contributing the money and Mr. Bennett giving his time. It is not fair to ask him to giv the year necessary to make the circuit of our globe and pay for getting out the books besides. The work will be dedicated to those advancing the $5's, and their names will be enrolled in the first volume, which is being forwarded at the rate of thirty-five or forty pages per week. It will take until about next January for it to be finished, and until that time the starry roll of honor is open to those who want to be pioneers in getting the truth. There hav been plenty of books of travel written, but all hav catered to some pious church prejudice, and, so far as telling the actual state of affairs existing in the "Holy Land" and the orient, were worth no more than what they would sell for as waste paper. Those who hav read Mr. Bennett's travels in Europe, written last year, will agree with us that his descriptions are faithful portraits of actual facts. He tells everything that he sees, and he has a shrewd way of seeing everything that is going on around him. His letters so far hav been marvels of descriptiv writing. The work, we feel sure, will be greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav, and we want all our friends and their friends to aid in disseminating it. There will be over one hundred and fifty full-page illustrations of scenes described, besides many smaller cuts. These will add greatly to the interest of the work, and with the faithful and close description will present Old-World places in a very familiar light. It will be as good as making the journey. And in order to pay for all this we shall keep the list open yet awhile longer in the hope that many more will yet send in their names. It isn't exactly square that the eleventh-hour laborers should get as much as the early workers, but if that is divine justice poor fallible human beings cannot be blamed if we giv the ones who subscribe now just as fine a book as those who subscribed to send the editor off. We can call it that the first sent him away and the last bring him back. Send on the V.'s.

As the time slips by we are reminded that many subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER are getting in arrears. We hope they will not long remain so. The past few months are the dullest months with newspapers, and the receipts are the lighest, while the expenses are just as heavy as at any time. We hope those friends whose subscriptions hav expired will bear this fact in mind and renew at once without waiting for us to send them bills. It takes time and money to send out hundreds of bills, which would be unnecessary if all would watch their tab and remit promptly. We hope to hear from those in arrears right away.

ONE of the best things invented within the last few years is the Mackinnon pen. It is always ready for business, can be carried more easily in the pocket than a pencil, and with one filling will do all the writing a business man requires for a month. For continuous writing it is the best thing out, as it does not require constant dipping in the inkstand. It writes on any kind of paper, and will last a lifetime. The address of the Mackinnon Pen Co. is 192 Broadway, New York city.

W. F. JAMIESON has held an eight-sessions debate with Rev. John Hughes, of Angola, Indiana. The opening was on October 27th, and the closing on November 2d. He lectured at the Opera House in Union City, Michigan, on the 4th and 5th inst., and will continue the course on the 6th. He will be at Petersburgh, Illinois, on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th; at Shelbyville, Ill., on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th. He may be addressed at either of the last two places, or at Albion, Michigan.

A Touching Appeal.

A. B. Davis is in a relapse. Very low, unable to turn himself in bed, cannot be moved, and I cannot leave the house. We need twenty-five dollars immediately to make him comfortable for winter. He lies in the cellar, as the upper room must be plastered before he can endure the cold. He has had two congestiv chills, once laid out as if dead. His sufferings are great and he needs things for his comfort.

What I Don't Believe.

PART II.—NO. 57.

624. Ninth. The titles which were applied to Jesus were by no means new in the world. Such cognomens as "the Most High," "the Lord of Life," "the Son of God," "the Living God," "the Mediator," "the Savior," "the Redeemer," "the Redeemer of the World," "the Lamb of God," "the Ram of God," "the Holy Lamb," "the True Light," "the Sun of Righteousness," "the True Light of the World," "the Prince of Peace," "the Light of the Wise," "the Guide to the Erring," "the Advocate with the Father," etc., are titles which were bestowed upon other demigods long before his name was spoken on the earth.

625. Tenth. The legend of Jesus being saved from destruction when all the other children around him were put to death was not first told of him. A very similar narrative was told of Christna near a thousand years before him.

626. Eleventh. Jesus being tempted by the devil and retiring in the wilderness for a forty days' fast was not a new claim. The same had been set up for other semi-divine personages long before his time.

627. Twelfth. Jesus was by no means the first who was claimed to perform miracles. This claim was set up for more than a score of sons of gods before his time. Several of them were said to raise the dead.

628. Thirteenth. Jesus was by no means the first savior or teacher who had a band of disciples to follow him about over the country. This was especially true of Christna, Buddha, Confucius, Laotse, and others who lived long before Jesus, as well as of Apollonius, Simon Magus, and Mohammed later on.

629. Fourteenth. All these teachers traveled over the country, in the cities, and villages, country places, in wilderness places, and on the common highways. If Jesus lived he only patterned after those who had preceded him.

630. Fifteenth. The claim that at the crucifixion of Jesus the sun was darkened and that earthquakes took place, was not set up first for Jesus. The same had been told of others long before him.

631. Sixteenth. The claim that Jesus descended into hell after his crucifixion, and that he was resurrected again, is far older than he. It was claimed for others before him.

632. Seventeenth. The claim of final ascension into heaven was made for others before Jesus.

633. Eighteenth. The doctrine of the trinity is not new with Christianity. It was taught in other systems, a thousand years before Christianity had an existence.

634. Nineteenth. The belief in a Holy Ghost did not originate with Jesus nor the system he is believed to have founded. It existed in India long before.

635. Twentieth. The Christian devil is not nearly so old as the devils of many pagan countries. The paternity of the belief in a devil can by no means be credited to Christianity.

636. Twenty-first. The belief in orders of angels and celestial spirits of different grades was held by the Persians and other pagans, probably a thousand years before Christianity was thought of in the world.

637. Twenty-second. The belief in the existence of heaven and hell is undoubtedly a thousand years older than Christianity. It was taught by the Hindoos, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Grecians and Romans before Christianity had birth. Christians only adopted it from previous systems.

638. Twenty-third. Immortality of the soul and a future life were by no means first taught by Christians. They were clearly inculcated by every intelligent nation and by almost every system of religion save that of the Jews, in which system a future life was not recognized.

639. Twenty-fourth. The personized idea of the "logos," or the word, was not original with Christianity. This was distinctly taught by Plato and others five hundred years before St. John or any other Christian had anything to say about it.

640. Twenty-fifth. Baptism by water was not first used in the Christian system, but was borrowed from the oriental countries where it had been used for hundreds of years at least The Brahmans and Buddhists baptized in the sacred river Ganges many hundreds of years before John the Baptist baptized in the river Jordan.

641. Twenty-sixth. The claim that the Holy Ghost descended in the form of a dove was not first told in connection with Jesus, but is far older. The Holy Ghost idea undoubtedly originated in India.

642. Twenty-seventh. The cross, as a religious symbol, was not first used by Christianity. It was used in India, Thibet, and Egypt not less than a thousand years before Christianity had birth.

643. Twenty-eighth. The sacrament of the eucharist was not of Christian origin, but was practiced by the pagan nations of India centuries before there was any Christianity in the word.

644. Twenty-ninth. A belief in saints and the worship of them did not begin with Christianity, but was practiced by the Hindoos and others long, long before, as well as by other nations.

645. Thirtieth. A belief in a grand judgment day did by no means originate with Christianity. It was taught by the Persian and Egyptian systems many hundred years before.

646. Thirty-first. A belief in a resurrection of t he deswad not first taught by Christians. This doctrin was old before Christianity came upon the stage.

647. Thirty-second. Prayer and its efficacy were not first taught by Christianity. They were taught and practiced by many pagan nations from time immemorial.

648. Thirty-third. Fasting and festivals are not Christian institutions. They were both largely used more than a thousand years before the Christian era.

649. Thirty-fourth. The doctrine of the second birth was not first taught by Jesus. It was inculcated hundreds of years before his time.

650. Thirty-fifth. The necessity of repentance for wrong conduct and penance for evil conduct were not first taught by Christians. These were insisted upon by pagan religious teachers hundreds of years before.

651. Thirty-sixth. The power to forgive sin was not first taught by Christians. The pagans were much before them in this line.

652. Thirty-seventh. The order of the priesthood, like all the other modern paraphernalia of the Christian system, was borrowed from paganism. The Christian priests, in telling the will and purpose of God, and in praying to him for what they and their people want, simply imitate the millions of pagan priests who preceded them.

653. Thirty-eighth. Monasteries, convents, and nunneries did not originate with the Christian system; they existed in Asiatic countries before Christianity had birth.

654. Thirty-ninth. The robes and surplices used by Christian priests, with the dalmatica, cope, and all the trappings and paraphernalia used by the Christian priesthood, were in use in the pagan systems of religion many hundreds of years before Christianity was devised.

655. Fortieth. So it is with every dogma, rite, and sacrament in the Christian church—they were one and all borrowed from the pagan systems, which had a much earlier existence. If it has anything new or original I do not know what it is save it is the relentless and deadly persecution which it has visited upon those who have dared to dissent from its positions. In this it may be claimed to have been original, for no other system of religion has persecuted as have Christians; not one of them all have taken one-tenth part the number of human lives in the name of its god as Christianity has taken in the name of Jesus.

656. Not only are the doctrines of Christianity not new, but the teachings attributed to Jesus are also not new, but had been inculcated many years before he was born. It is claimed for him that he was the first to teach the love of man; the first to teach man to love his neighbor as himself; but this is not true. This doctrine was taught by Menu, Christna, Buddha, Confucius, Thales, Pettacus, Socrates, Plato, and many others hundreds of years before Jesus taught a word.

657. Even the Golden Rule, which is regarded as the purest and most elevated lesson ever taught in the world, though ascribed to Jesus, was assuredly taught many hundreds of years earlier by several of the teachers above named, as well as by others of the world's great moralists and instructors. It seems hardly necessary for a God to leave his throne in heaven to come down to the earth and mingle with the sin and corruption which abound here for the purpose of teaching the same doctrines, the same maxims, the same sentiments which had hundreds of times, and centuries earlier, been taught by others. One would believe when a God came into the world with far superior knowledge and wisdom to anything that had been heard before that he would have something new to offer to man, and superior to the lessons and precepts which had for hundreds of years been taught by common human beings.

A Letter from a Londoner.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Congresses and ecumenical councils are now the order of the day, and all the religious bodies in this country are holding one or the other. The church, as by law appointed, has been busy in this respect during the past week. The Congress having met at Newcastle in the diocese of Durham, the bishop of that place was made president and played first fiddle. In his inaugural address he told his hearers that "the scares regarding recent advances in astronomical and zoological science had passed away, and their theological conceptions had been corrected and enlarged by their teachings. And now biology concentrated the same interests and excited the same distrusts; buwt uld not history here repeat itself? If the time should come when evolution was translated from the region of suggestiv theory to that of acknowledged fact, would it not carry still further the idea of providential design and order, would it not reinforce with new and splendid illustrations the magnificent lessons of modern science, and the gathering up, as it were, of the threads which connect the universe in the right hand of the one eternal word?"

The foregoing effusion seems to me a most unblushing piece of impudence on the part of this "right reverend father in God;" it simply amounts to this, that although in past times when the priests had all the power, and, more consistent than their successors of the present time, strenuously opposed the advancement of scientific knowledge as being in direct contradiction to what is contained in the Bible, and promptly settled all rash discoverers of the working of the laws of nature, with the very conclusiv argument of the rack and stake; the priests of to-day are quite willing, and almost eager, to accept all new theories regarding the origin of man and language, etc., notwithstanding what Moses thought on the subject, provided they can get a sufficient following of deluded individuals to find the funds to keep them in luxurious idleness.

The Archbishop of York favored the company with his views on "Secularism," which he said could not be called a system. Its principles were "Atheistic," Republican, and Malthusian, which meant no god, no king, and as few people as possible. This elicited cheers, at which I am rather surprised. I should hav thought that an assembly who believed in a God, worshiped a king, and desired a large population of "hewers of wood and drawers of water" would hav better represented their feeings by groans and agonized writhings. As it was, it looked as though they approved of these principles.

The deputy head of the church went on to state that secularism was but a passing phase of a great movement which, however, demanded the deepest attention of the devout. The advance of science had been immense, and it was intended to be a gift of God for good to man. (By this he appears to hav had a new revelation.) But the business of science was with natural laws, and to these it confined itself. It disapproved of secularism as retarding science by mixing it with Atheism, with which science has nothing to do. Yet when the name of God was put aside in science, there was a danger that it would be forgotten, and thus it came about that there was an advance of Materialism among the thinking classes. There was much more to the same effect which it would be tedious to quote. This particular congress was great on science. The speakers talked as though they knew all about it, and were its best friends instead of its greatest enemies. They think that by clinging to the skirts of science they may get a free-lease of existence. But the church has a feeling that it is doomed, and is therefore catching at any straw to prolong its miserable life. Not so many years back it was strong enough and felt itself so secure as to excommunicate all the other sects, and now it is not only ready but anxious to "hold out the right hand of fellowship" (to use one of their cant terms) to the Nonconformists, all or any of them, even that greatest of all nuisances, the Salvation Army.

Some of the speakers expressed their opinion that this noble, or rather ignoble, "army should be encouraged as doing a work in making recruits from the gutter which the church did not encompass;" though whether it was the army, the gutter, or the work that the church did not encompass does not very clearly appear. I rather suspect the dignitaries of the church of England hav an eye to the income of the army, as the leader of the noisy gang of imbecils boasted the other day at a public meeting that it was now worth £50,000 per annum, but I do not think they stand much chance of getting a share of the plunder, as "General" Booth clearly shows his intention of sticking to all the money he can rake in. He suggested to his deluded followers the other day that both he and God would be highly pleased if they would kindly pass over to him any jewelry they possessed. But this happy suggestion did not seem to meet with any very enthusiastic reception, so the matter was dropped, at all events for the present.

The report of the intended visit of Col. Ingersoll to England on a lecturing tour has caused quite a flutter in the hen-roost, and the old women of both sexes who belong to the ranks of the godly are in a fearful state of excitement, wildly clucking around and collecting their brood under the maternal wings. Nearly all the religious journals hav had a shot at him and hav been employed in confuting the matter contained in his lectures, no doubt to their own satisfaction. One very big bug amongst us, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker, to giv him his full title, in which he delights, has written a series of articles in a paper he runs, on "What Shall We Do to be Saved?" the first one of which he has devoted to taking great exception to the cheers and applause that greeted Ingersoll's remarks. The remaining papers were unimportant, as not having much bearing on the subject. He is, however, a smart man, having published his reply in book form, and as he sells the lecture as well as the book, I dare say he makes the speculation pay very well.

A curious book has lately been written and published by the Rev. M. Baxter, editor of a religious paper in London, which professes to giv a correct interpretation of the inspired jumble composed by the hermit of the isle of Patmos. Baxter has found out what it all means; he alone has solved the mystery; he knows when the end of the world is coming, to a minute, and possesses a program of the performances; probably he will assist in checking off the sinners. The book is most beautifully illustrated with winged women and correct representations of dragons with assorted heads, of which each one seems to hav a plentiful supply—one has seven, another ten—and the beasts and elders are correctly portrayed. Consequently the work is most valuable, all the pictures being guaranteed as true likenesses. The "facts" in the book are all proved by elaborate tables of figures, so you will see it is all true—true as the Bible.

Yours skeptically, J. D.

The Last from London.

Your Council begs to submit to you an analysis of the reports received from the various countries.

The Fédération des Sociétés Rationalistes de la Belgique sends a printed report of its eighth congress, held at Brussels on March 28th and 29th, 1880, and the Libre Pensee of Brussels sends one for the same year. These are placed in the hands of the secretary, as publications forwarded to the General Council.

The reports bearing on the current year are as follows:

The Libre Pensee of Dinant (Belgium) reports that the society was founded on January 10, 1881, "having for principle liberty of conscience and for object the propagation of its ideas." The society has endeavored to reach the country people, to educate them into a sense of social, religious, and political liberty. It commenced with eighteen members, and has now fifty-two. One section goes into the villages on Sundays, teaching the people; another busies itself with the circulation of Liberal newspapers. During the coming winter Freethought meetings will be held at Dinant. The society meets on the second Monday in every month, and several lecturers have been appointed. The sceiety proposes that a general Freethinkers' almanac should be published, and announces its willingness to contribute.

The Libre Pensee of Antwerp (Belgium) reports that it numbers 109 members; that it has five hundred francs in hands; that it has spent four hundred francs in paying the expenses of the civil funerals of poor Freethinkers; that the most important debate held by it has been a discussion on the replacement of first communion in Catholic countries by a philosophical ceremony.

The National Secular Society (England) reports that during its last year of work (ending in June, 1881) it enrolled 828 new members, and has since June enrolled 406 more. It has seventy-five working branches in England; three branches in Scotland; one in Jersey; one in New Zealand; and is affiliated with the Hindoo Freethought Union. Some of the branches have halls of their own, others rent them. Weekly meetings are held by most for discussion of all subjects. There is a Special Lecturing Fund for carrying on propaganda in poor districts; a Benevolent Fund for assisting distressed Freethinkers; and an Open-air Propagandist Fund. Educational work is being pressed; a large number of students have been instructed in science during the year, and fifty have passed the Government Examinations. The society has been very active in political work, this being included in its progamme. The society hands in the report of its annual congress, and its Almanac for 1882, giving full particulars as to its organization and work. It also hands in eleven tracts issued by it, and a statement by its president on the laws on heresy in England. The organ of the society in the press is the National Reformer, issued weekly.

The Union Démocratique de Propagande Anti-Cléricale (France), which has just joined the Federation, has not had time to send a formal report, but its principles are handed in. It held a most successful Conference in May, 1881, and asks your Council to report that it is organizing a great demonstration in Paris in honor of the Freethought dead for November 2d, the Jour des Morts.

De Dageraad (Holland) reports that it has 140 members. Its journal bears the same name and appears monthly. The society states that the Dutch enjoy perfect religious liberty. There being no state church in Holland, the government does not in any way interfere or use its infiuence in matters of theology. Since the French Revolution prosecution for heresy is out of the question. With regard to the taking of the oath, the Dutch laws have not made any proviso for Atheists, and it is therefore obligatory. At the present time, however, there appears to be a strong feeling in the States-General to alter the law in this respect.

America and Germany have not sent in their reports in time for incorporation in this general report, but your Council hopes to be able to add them later.

A first year's work is naturally encumbered with very many difficulties, and many details of organization are still incomplete, but your Council ventures to hope that the Federation stands on a secure foundation, and will by the next congress be in more perfect working order. J. SWAAGMAN, Hon. Sec.

The report was received with loud cheers.

The delegate from America was called on.

I had a report from the Secretary of the National Liberal League, and prefaced its reading with a few remarks expressive of my pleasure in being able to meet with this body of Freethinking men and women, and descriptive of the condition of Freethought and Liberalism in the United States. I said the Liberal Leagues were the principal American Freethought organizations in our country, and that they numbered in all over two hundred and twenty, though many of them were not active. I spoke commendingly of the numerous societies of German Turners who are Freethinkers, who keep up active organization and have done much in St. Louis and other cities in opposing oppressive Sunday laws and other sectarian legislation. I said also that Liberalism and skepticism were rapidly gaining ground in the United States, that they were cropping out in nearly every town and village of the country, and that even in the churches skepticism is becoming more and more abundant. Interest in church attendance is lessening, and is largely confined to the female portion of the community. Public Liberal and scientific lectures are largely attended, and many efficient laborers are in the field, and I hope we may at all times be found coöperating with our compatriots of Europe who are striving to educate humanity in the principles of mental freedom and in opposing the superstitions and errors of the past. I then read the following report:

[This report was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Octobber 1st. It is not considered necessary to reproduce it here, but it will be printed in the book of Mr. Bennett's travels.—ED. T. S.]

The report was very warmly cheered, and Dr. Büchner then rose to make the report for Germany. Dr. Büchner said that his report was very brief. The German Freethought Union was still very young, having been founded at Frankfort-on-the-Main scarcely six months ago. They had made a good beginning, enrolling five hundred members. They hoped to grow year by year, and have a good report for the next Congress. They had already several affiliated societies—one in Berlin, one in Vienna, and so on. They were going to issue leafiets, and utilize individual effort. Germany had come in late, but it should be remembered that the German character was not rash nor quick—was rather dreamy and philosophical than practical. But it would be a shame and a disgrace if Germany, with her poets, her philosophers, her thinkers, who had all toiled for the freedom of man, should not stand in the first rank. Dr. Büchner concluded with a few graceful words of thanks, and was vehemently cheered as he resumed his seat.

Mr. Bradlaugh: It is now necessary to ask this Congress if it approves of the action of the general Council as to holding it in London. A formal vote is necessary, for whilst the Council acted in the interest of Freethought, it undoubtedly exceeded the powers given it at Brussels. The place of meeting was to be fixed every year by those who were assembled in Congress. Last year Paris was chosen. But it was also decided that the society in the selected town should have the duty of verifying the delegations, and of making arrangements for the Congress. No society was to be allowed to do this unless it was affiliated to the International Freethought Association and unless it had paid its subscription. The statutes further provide for a general council, composed of representatives of each nation, to be chosen before January 1st in each year. Long before that date we thought a difficulty might occur, as the French Freethinkers did not make any sign. I, therefore, as one of the representatives of England, the country in which the council met, ventured to write to M. Goffin, the president of the Congress of 1880, and to point out the difficulty we should be in if no French society affiliated itself. I also wrote to other Frenchmen personally known to me. This was all unofficial. When the Council met it did me the honor to elect me as its chairman. Mr. Le Lubez, Mr. Swaagman, and myself now wrote officially to France, urging that the Congress had been held in September, that it was now January, that no members of the Council had been elected by France, no French society had affiliated itself with the Association, and the French society had adjourned until May. Later we wrote again and asked if France would appoint even an "irregular" delegate. As he would not be elected until after January 1st, he could not have the right to vote, but the Council might take his opinions in the same light as votes. Thus France had an opportunity of doing what ought to have been done and what they might still want to do. They did nothing. More difficulties now appeared. There were two Freethought bodies in France; the one the Union Anti-Cléricale, the other the La Federation Française de la Libre Pensée. Between these there was undoubted hostility. The latter did not think the former extreme enough. In fact, the notions of the Federation Française included matters that the International Association does not as a Freethought association include in its programme. We do not propose to discuss the government, the social changes, or needs of any particular country. We want to work solely upon the Freethought ground common to all countries. We have no right to commit our members to anything outside Freethought. And this is what the Federation Française wished to do. As there were then no means of calling the Congress in Paris, we proposed London. It is for the Congress to decide if it will vote an indemnity for our action. We shall be glad to give any further explanation that may be asked. I may add that we actually sent Mr. Le Lubez over to France to try and arrange matters.

Mr. Von Zonteveen, who, it was stated, had objected to the oath in Holland, and whose warm reception evidently moved him, said: I myself saw with great pleasure that the Congress was to be held at London. At Brussels last year I spoke on behalf of this city. Some of us do not like Paris, as so many of the Freethinkers there are not only Socialists, but refuse to separate their Freethought from their Socialism even in a Federation like this. I read in the papers that a Freethought Congress had taken place in Paris last week, and should like to know some details, and also by whose authority it was called.

Mr. Bradlaugh: Clearly that Congress has nothing to do with this Association. Freethinkers, and anyone else, have the right to hold as many Congresses as they like. We have no quarrel with our friends in France. It was impossible for us to go to Paris, and what they have done there does not concern or commit this Federation in any way.

Dr. Schläger: At Brussels the statutes of this Federation were made, and, after much discussion, Paris was chosen as the place of meeting for 1881. From a foreigner's standpoint, I must confess that the action of the general Council seems like a coup d'état. This ministry must, therefore, ask an indemnity at your hands. Otherwise we establish a precedent—horrible words to you English, who labor under traditional precedents of three or four hundred years of English stupidity. I am willing to vote for this indemnity. But let it be settled that only in extreme cases like this ought any deviation from the will of the Congress to be allowed. And we ought to have each year a guarantee from the society in the city chosen that the necessary arrangements will be carried out. The speaker concluded with a motion of indemnity to the council for their action in selecting London as the place of meeting for the Congress of this year.

Mrs. Besant: I feel a little guilty in this matter, as I was one of those who spoke and voted for Paris last year, as a city more accessible to the majority than any other. What Dr. Schläger said is really what the Council wants at your hands. We have gone beyond our authority. We have had to break a rule either way. Either we had to reverse the decision of the Congress of 1880 that the Congress of 1881 should be in Paris, or to break the law that the arrangements for a Congress should be made by a society affiliated to the International Federation. Such a society did not exist in Paris. We broke the less important rule. We had the charge given us to keep this Federation free from all political controversy. It was decided at Brussels that our aim was to attack religious prejudices, and not "all prejudices." The political needs of each country are different, their religious difficulties are one. To go to Paris was to place the Federation in the hands of those who insist on including politics in Freethought discussion, and who, without belonging to us, might have wrecked the Federation. In avoiding this great danger we have traveled beyond our authority, and it is for the Congress to decide whether we have done right or wrong. We hope that some day it may be possible for soldiers of freedom from all countries to unite in general work, but this is at present impossible, and if we attempt it the Federation will be wrecked. The introduction of a discussion of Socialism into our Congress would be as that of a bombshell, and at present our duty is to work for Freethought alone. We had one duty to our constituents to fulfil and the result is our meeting here. We held it in London because London had last year more votes than any other town save Paris. This year let us vote one definitely, and choose also a second, so that if difficulties occur as to the first place we can fall back upon the second. One thing above all I am anxious to say: To our French friends we have no hostility. None are more anxious than the English Freethinkers to work with our French Republican brethren. In no heart here—German, Dutch, Belgian, American, English—is a single thought against France. It is even good that they can call a Congress also. We do not depreciate their work. We rejoice that while we are working, they also are. Let us remember that they have difficulties unknown to us. We do not blame. We love, honor, and respect them. We meet without criticising their work; but we must carry on ours on the lines laid down for us by the Congress that met at Brussels last year.

M. D'Ablaing stated that when he heard that the council had failed in arranging the Congress for Paris, he had tried if he could give any help through private friends. He had at first hoped to be successful, but he found it was impossible to draw the sections together. The Parisians wished to have a Congress of their own, and the holding of the International Congress there would have seemed like a contest. The Dutch were not invited to Paris, and he regarded the Congress there as a French gathering, in no way connected with the Federation. Under very difficult circumstances the council had acted for the best.

Mr. Vancaubergh (translated by Mr. Bradlaugh) was in a difficulty, as he did not quite follow the discussion. He attended the Paris Congress, and it was there suggested that a united gathering should be held at Rome in 1882. The Belgium Freethinkers considered that Freethought and politics should be kept wholly apart; our work should be Freethought work, and political and social questions should be dealt with outside our platform. Paris Freethought was different, as was marked by the name chosen, which implied that all the Freethinkers in that body should be Socialists. To assent to this would be fatal to the movement. He still hoped that the Paris groups would see their way to coöperate with us.

A delegate wished to know if any one was present from the Parisian society whose evidence could be taken.

Mr. Bradlaugh pointed out that the society had not yet joined us, and was not affiliated.

The passsing of a vote of indemnity to the Council was then put and carried unanimously.

Mr. Bradlaugh rose to propose a place of meeting for next year. After explaining the difficulty that would arise from the absence of a society in Rome, and also from police superintendence, he proposed that the Congress for 1882 should be held at Frankfort, or, failing that, at Amsterdam.

Mr. Vancaubergh (translated by Mr. Bradlaugh) proposed Rome, in the hope that thus all sections of the Freethought party might join in the Congress of of the Federation.

Mr. Hilditch seconded.

Dr. Schläger: Nobody is more desirous of reconciliation with Paris than I. I fear it is impossible to hold a Congress at Rome, picturesque as the idea looks. As to effect, at Rome our Congress would fall dead upon the mass of the people of the country. The newspapers there are little read in their own country, and not at all outside it. I therefore support Frankfort, which retains some of the old democratic spirit, and where a democratic paper of large circulation is published, that is sure to report our Congress.

Dr. Büchner (translated by Mrs. Besant) urged that Frankfort would be a place as difficult as Rome for the Congress. Even the police difficulties would be as great in the one case as in the other. Besides, their society in Germany was young, and could, perhaps, hardly bear the strain of holding a Congress in 1882 in that country.

Mr. Frowein (translated by Mr. Swaagman): The same difficulty exists in regard to Amsterdam as to Frankfort. We have been only established three years. I thank you none the less for the honor you do to the country of Spinoza.

As 1 P. M. had now come, the discussion upon this question was adjourned.

After the close of the morning meeting, by invitation of Mr. Bradlaugh, the delegates repaired to an upper room in the hall and partook of an excellent dinner, which about fifty persons sat down to. Every one seemed to enjoy himself and to partake freely of the viands before him. Mr. Bradlaugh proposed the health of the foreign delegates, which was drank standing, and he was toasted in return, as was also Dr. Büchner.

SECOND SITTING. 2:30 P. M.

M. Frowein, of Holland, was called upon to open the question of "The Separation of Church and State."

The President then called on Mrs. Besant to read the English report. Mrs. Besant said:

The National Secular Society, of which I have the honor to be one of the vice-presidents, has desired me to report to this Congress on the relations of church and state in England.

These relations have grown out of the Reformation in England in the sixteenth century, when England, under Henry VIII., threw off Roman authority, and made the "king's highness to be supreme head of the church of England" (26 Hen. VIII., c. 1). Before that time the church had treated the state from an equal if not a superior standpoint; from the passing of that memorable act she became the subject of the state. The state, represented by the king, altered her faith, narrowed her authority, diminished her wealth. Many of her vast estates passed into lay hands, being distributed among court favorites; the remainder were transferred to the reformed Church, a church which succeeded to Roman Catholic funds while rejecting Roman Catholic doctrines. To take but a single instance; many fellowships had been founded in the universities by pious Roman Catholics, who joined to their bequests the condition that the holders of the fellowships should have masses said for their souls. The Reformed church kept a tight grip on the bequests, but denounced the masses as "idolatrous fables and blasphemous deceits," thus obtaining the double joy of increasing the revenues of favored churchmen, and posing as more purely Christian than those whose wealth was appropriated. While the new church thus succeeded to the property of the elder one, and left those who remained faithful to their creed in poverty and disgrace, she by no means permitted reformers more thorough than herself to have a share of the spoils. Roman Catholics were excluded because they believed too much; Protestant Dissenters because they believed too little, and the narrow "church as by law established" seized all the wealth and all the power.

The church, however, was no longer free; she had sold her birthright of liberty for a mess of pottage, and had become the creature of the state. By act of Parliament her prayer-book is authorized; by act of Parliament her ceremonies are controlled; by act of Parliament her daily lessons from the Bible are prescribed; her members worship their God in the form and fashion commanded by the state. This state is no longer even Christian, and the Jew can dictate to the churchman the formulæ of his faith. In exchange for this slavery, the state gives to the church various privileges, dignities, and grants of money; Dissenters are free, but any money they have for church purposes must be contributed by members of their own sects; the church of England enjoys vast revenues, which have been granted by the State.

A great number of the privileges originally enjoyed by the present church have been taken away from her during the last half century. Only eleven years ago no Dissenter, however distinguished, could be a Fellow of either of the great universities of Oxford and Cambridgein; 1871, after years of bitter struggle, was passed the University Tests bill, which placed all lay students on the same level.

The churchyards of the country have been wholly held by the clergy, and people of other faiths have been compelled to hear read over the bodies of their dead a service they had repudiated in life; near large towns the difficulty was avoided by the establishment, during the present century, of cemeteries open to all, but in country districts the most grievous injustice has been done. Little children who died unbaptized were shoveled into the ground during the night and the most revolting conflicts were waged round the coffin between the state clergy on the one side and the bereaved relatives on the other. Last year a Burial's act was passed (1880) which admits all citizens to their parish churchyard, although the corpses of Atheists are still insulted at the grave side, and so another victory was won for freedom.

A large part of the revenues of the church is drawn from land; in addition to the land actually held, rectors and vicars of parishes have the right of gathering in a special tax called tithe. The great tithes go to the rector; the lesser tithes to the vicar. Many of the great tithes passed, at the Reformation, into the hands of the laity; hence many rectors are laymen, and in such parishes the ecclesiastical work is performed by a vicar. A considerable agitation against the payment of tithes is now going on; some clergymen have seized the goods of farmers in their parishes for tithes owing so them, and a feeling of indignation is rising which appears likely to sweep them away.

The levying of church rates has been another grievance in England; Dissenters of all shades of opinion have taxed for the support and repair of churches they never entered; an enormous number of persons at length submitted to distrain rather than pay this unjust tax, and at last, in 1868, compulsory church rates were abolished. In a few parishes part of the church funds is still, however, drawn from such a rate, and several cases of seizure of goods have occurred during the last year in satisfaction of unpaid church rate. These oppressions are, fortunately, rapidly increasing the unpopularity of the clergy.

Although this direct taxation of dissenters—including in this name all outside the church—for the support of the Establishment has mostly been abolished, the taxpayers are still heavily burdened for the maintenance of the state religion. In addition to the vast revenues enjoyed by the church, amounting to more than ten millions sterling per annum, large sums have been from time to time voted in Parliament. Thus, from 1710–1716 a tax of 2*s.*, and from 1716–1724 of 3*s.*, per ton or chaldron was levied on all coal brought into the port of London, and was used to build new churches (Public Income and Expenditure, printed by order of the House of Commons, July 29, 1869). The produce was estimated at £60,000 a year. In 1725 the same tax was levied to pay the ministers. Thus £420,000 were given to the church out of the pockets of the coal owners, and this is only a single specimen out of the many which might be adduced did time permit.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners report that during the year ending in October, 1880, they have augmented and endowed benefices to the amount of £765,500 per annum, and this "may be taken to represent the income which would be derived from a capital sum of about £23,000,000" (33d report, 1881). These commissioners deal with the so-called church property, property which is vested in the church for just so long as, and no longer than, Parliament chooses, and its enormous value being due to the energy and industry which have developed the resources of the country, it would be fitting that this wealth should be applied to lighten the burdens of the nation, and not monopolized by a sect which, in the census of 1851, only claimed fifty-two per cent of the "worshiping population of England and Wales." Outside cathedral establishments, the clergy number 17,970 (Parliamentary Return, 1879), and these live on the wealth of the country.

Our yearly taxation is further augmented by the sums voted in Parliament to the clergy: thus the army estimates were increased last year by £50,600 for "divine service," and £51,604 14*s.* 11*d.* were actually expended. For the current year the estimate is £52,356, and this while the wages of our toilers are at starvation point, and we are bidding them emigrate to find life. A corresponding item appears in the navy estimates. The prisons are provided with chaplains, whose salaries vary from £450 a year downwards. And so on through the various classes of national expenditure.

We have two archbishops and twenty-eight bishops, with incomes ranging from £15,000 to £3,000 a year; of these twenty-six sit in our House of Lords, and are notorious for their opposition to every measure intended for the elevation and happiness of the masses. Their votes may be counted on for any unjust war, such as those lately waged in Afghanistan and the Transvaal, and they are the most reactionary members of a reactionary house. The lower clergy are ineligible to Parliament, and this disability ought to vanish with the disestablishment of the church.

Fortunately, signs are not wanting that the burden of the Establishment will soon be removed from our shoulders. The better members of the priesthood are beginning to grow impatient of the slavery in which they live, and to think that liberty is too high a price to pay for privilege. The most hard working of the clergy belong to the ritualistic, the Romanizing, party in the church, and on these the state control weighs with especial heaviness. The Public Worship act lately passed by our latitudinarian Parliament deprives them of some of their ceremonies attendant on their most cherished superstition, and one of their number, Mr. Green, is now in prison because he refuses to obey the law, while claiming the status bestowed on him by law. This position cannot long continue; if priests desire liberty to follow their own fancies they must give up the privileges of an establishment; paid by the state, they must obey the state; they cannot enjoy at once the dignity of state maintenance and the liberty of self-supporting societies.

In speaking of the enmity we feel to the church, I desire to place distinctly on record that we do not desire to retort on the church the penal enactments she has leveled against us in the past. We desire equal liberty, not our own predominance. We admit the right of others to worship; we claim the right not to worship. We would destroy the church by reason, by argument, by persuasion, but not by force. We cannot soil our hands with the Christian weapon of brutal persecution. Therefore, in urging you to attack the church, I add, to prevent misconception, that while you seek to destroy monopoly and privilege, you should aim at the equality of all, of opponents as well as of friends.

The church in England is the center of all the agencies that oppose our national progress; she is the bulwark of every class privilege, the defense of every class monopoly. This vast organization, with its huge wealth and its social supremacy, is the symbol of all that is worst and most unjust in our social system. We war against it as the deadliest foe of national equality and national liberty, and we know that the day of our triumph is not far off.

Dr. Schläger said that Macaulay had written one of the best things of the English church when he said that it was never, even by accident, on the right side. The connection between church and state might be paralleled by the state of marriage. At first all is merry as a marriage-bell. Later on, a struggle is very likely to appear. We find in the history of the relationship between church and state the same grades of aversion between the two as occur between married people. In discussions on topics like these we are reminded that truth is only relative. No general principle can be laid down certainly. Each has to modify abstract ideas into practical ones. Germany has been for ages the classical battle-ground of this question. The history of the middle ages is one of a constant struggle between emperor and pope. That country, in the Thirty Years' War, shed her blood in the cause of freedom, and made Protestantism and Cromwell possible. When France had driven out the Huguenots, and in most countries only one religion was tolerated, Prussia alone carried out the principle of equality among the Catholic, Lutheran, and Calvinistic churches. By the treaty of Westphalia, 1748, expulsion of men on account of religious views ceased. Catholics and Protestants are equal politically. But recently a cloud has arisen upon the horizon. Bismarck, representing the state, wanted to crush the independence of the Catholics, and the means he chose have brought about the independence of liberal-minded Germany. The May laws of 1874 struck out clauses giving the same freedom to Catholic and Protestant churches. What have been the conseqsences of these laws? Many Roman Catholic parishes are without priests, as the pope forbade the latter to comply with the laws. Obligatory baptism is abolished. The sacerdotal incomes have suffered, as many people, having been civilly married, do not now go also to the priest. Multitudes of children are not baptized, and in the city of Berlin are growing up irreligious. Just now, however, there is some difficulty politically. Bis marck has to make up his majority by bidding for the votes of the one hundred Roman Catholic representatives in the German Parliament. Hence there has been a modification of the May laws. However, the struggle will appear in some other form. Church and state are as two drunken men that lean against one another to prevent their falling. Ideas are a power in the world, and will decide this. Religion is being subjected to a process of dissolution. The wife has ceased to be attractive. We may congratulate ourselves that we live in an age when this struggle is going on. We must agitate on behalf of those ideas that are destined to final victory.

Mr. G. J. Holyoake desired to say a few words on the view taken by some of his Belgian friends. The separation of church and state was almost the only universal question which they could profitably discuss; each state has something to do with it. He spoke for common equality; the Establishment was the symbol of insolent superiority. It pushed itself before heaven as the supreme representative of its interests on earth. The church came to the front in the presence of God, but he was in favor of all having an equal chance of showing religious conviction. The church thought that because Freethinkers were in favor of separation, therefore separation would be harmful to religion. He did not think so. The church was a plundering church, and wanted to seize heaven, but if God was the god of the honest it would not get it. The church consecrated the ground so that heaven might know which were the saints, and sent abroad chaplains to guard the flock. He was in favor of separation, so that all might be equal in the eye of the law, and, if heaven regarded privileges, in the eye of heaven. He objected to the connection of church and state because if the Christian religion was to exist it should exist without privilege, and the prayer of every one should have an equal chance of being heard.

Mr. Bradlaugh had not meant to speak, but was tempted to do so by Dr. Schläger's speech. The separation of church and state would, as Dr. Schläger said, be a revolution, but he did not think it would mean civil war. Separation, in a country where there were free platform, free speech, would be a revolution, but a revolutiou of brain and not of body, of mental, not physical, force. The struggle of the middle ages was between Guelf and Ghibelline, between pope and emperor, not between church and state. It was the struggle of craft against physical strength, and great as was its value, it was not the struggle of to-day, but a struggle of brain against brute force. We owed much to Germany, much to the people who stand as the philosophers of the world. But we also owed much to France, to France, who had done, what Germany had not, made free speech possible. He desired not to lessen the value of German endeavor, but he did desire to remember and remind others how France had bled, how she had struggled in her revolution against aristocracy and church, and deserved our willing homage. Voltaire, Condorcet, not only destroyed; they put into their works the force and energy which gave light and life to the world. And therefore, acknowledging our great debt to German learning, German work, and German patience, we must not deny that from France came the vitality, the fire, the wit, the energy, that made possible the Freethought of to-day.

The evening meeting was very fully attended. Every inch of standing room in the house was occupied, the passway from the street was crammed, the sidewalk was crowded, and some even ascended to the roof and listened through the ventilating windows. Many also went away unable to gain admittance. Mr. Bradlaugh had been announced to speak in the evening, and that was the great attraction. He draws here as Ingersoll would draw in America. His speech is reported as follows, though he added considerable not here given:

HERESY IN ALL AGES.

At a gathering at which Freethinkers are present from many foreign countries, it is an acceptible task to endeavor to trace the progress of heresy throughout the world.

It is somewhat wonderful that in the last quarter of the nineteenth century it should be possible, in any civilized country, to make the heresy of any woman or man matter of reproach or hindrance to her or him. It is, indeed, to the heresy of the world that all progress is due. Without the skeptical challenge, the firm inquiry, the examining doubt, the testing and verifying experience, there would always have been the stagnation of ignorance, or the deterioration and warping influence of superstition. In old times much heresy was impossible; there was no general education; there could not be any popular heresy. The heretics were few in number, their brilliant mental achievements and often terrible sufferings marking them out in the darkness of their age and country, as stars stand out clearest in the blackest night. There are many classes of heresy. Religious heresy, challenging either the religion of a particular country, or assailing the very foundation of all religions; political heresies and social heresies. In an International Freethought conference it is with heresies in questions of religion that we are alone concerned. We do not, in thus limiting our work, mean any slight to earnest workers for human enfranchisement in social or political matters. We only desire to keep our propaganda distinct and clear. Political and social needs may vary in each land, but the conflict between ignorance and reason is in truth but one conflict in all climes, whatever the formula attacked or faith asserted. In matters of religion there can only be two clear logical positions. One, the completest submission of the intellect to authority; to some book, or church, or man. The other, the most thorough assertion of the right and duty of individual thought and judgment. These positions are so antagonistic that there can be no truce or peace between the defenders of the one and of the other. As Freethinkers we claim this right and duty of individual thought, the free and complete expression of the individual judgment. Guided, and aided too, this thought must needs be by the thought of yesterday and of to-day. But we deny that yesterday's thought ought to be allowed to conclude all thinking. We deny that yesterday's knowledge may be held to include all that is or can be knowable. We claim to search for truth, and to show others what we find, and they, with us, may test whether it be true or no. We assert the right to think, and to tell openly and clearly all we can of what it is we think, and how we think it.

We affirm that in no country ought thought on matters of religion to be hindered by penal laws. We declare that in every country religious disabilities should be swept away. We do not want to train our children while babies so that they must grow into the assailants of any creed, but we refuse to allow the priest to twist and distort the infant mind with creed and fear. We would have children's education limited to science, leaving each unfettered to build his theory or choose his creed as brain-strength comes with growth. We have no desire to prevent or punish any religion by law. We would have all religions, like all sciences, on equal terms, the reward being in the future to the greatest discoverer of new truths, not as it has been in the past, to the most obstinate upholder of ancient delusions. We claim the same equality of citizenship for professors of belief, unbelief, and disbelief. But if special honor is claimed for any, then heresy should have it as truest servitor of human kind. We here all claim to be Freethinkers, therefore, we are no more all of one thought than we are of one stature or of one country. Nor do we make any claim that we, or any other thinkers, know all that can be known. We stand on the great ocean of the unknown, each mental eye seeing different shades of color on its waves, each thought-diver gathering from its depths truth corals and pearls that others miss to grasp or cannot reach.

In one of the very oldest countries, but where education has been most general and most esteemed, there heresy has been reputed and valued instead of punished. That country is China. Prof. Douglas, writing for the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, admits that Confucianism "has supplied the guiding principles of all that is great and noble in the life of China for more than twenty centuries." Yet there is nothing of the supernatural in the teachings of Confucius. He troubled himself much as to how men might live. He concerned himself not at all with what should be their career, or if they should have any career, when they were no longer living. This paradox has no place in his teachings. So of another great child of this Chinese race, Laotse. Of him Prof. Douglas writes: "Of a personal God Laotse knew nothing; and indeed a belief in such a being would be in opposition to the whole tenor of his philosophy." Yet these twain are, with Buddha, the great masters of Chinese thought.

Perhaps the clearest record of heretic progress is preserved to us from Greece. There—almost about the very time when Buddha indelibly engraved his name on Chinese thought—philosophy lifted its head in Greece, and made thought easier in all time for all the western world. There is not the time to-night to trace the history of Greek skepticism, nor to linger over the page that tells of the hemlock cup which silenced the tongue without smothering the sayings of questioning Socrates. We must not even—after some centuries leap—stop to pity the sore martyrdom or to admire the eloquence of the pure, the beautiful Hypatia. Temples have been built to these and their heretic brothers and sisters, not in marble or in granite, but in working, stirring, doubting, reasoning, and truth-coining human brains.

It would be ungrateful to quite pass by Arabian heresy and our indebtedness to it; even though we have not space enough to give due honor, it is to the Arab of the tenth and eleventh centuries that we today owe much. When learning had been trampled down throughout all Christendom it was the Arab who not only gathered and preserved the mental legacy of India, Italy, Greece, and Egypt, but added to it the tenfold interest of his new discovery and keen thinkings in every then possible branch of science.

But our business to-night is with heresy since real heresy has been possible. That is, possible for the many. That is, since the printing-press has been known in Europe, and since men talked to men openly in their own tongue. In the great arsenals of Europe huge monster cannon are built to shatter human homes, and shot and shell are cast and filled with which to load these cannon. The printing-press is our grand cannon; thought, question, and affirmation our shot and shell. Book and tongue are our sword and bayonet. Pen and speech our lance and spear. But neither our writers nor our speakers have gone through the fight unscathed.

Italy shows us, during the last three and a half centuries, a terribly full martyr's roll. Dungeon, rack, and fagot were the ready arguments of the Roman Catholic church. And these were freely used. The mere list of names of these Italian martyrs for Freethought would take more time than to-night can be spared, but one name must at least be repeated with much reverence and more of triumph. That of the man burned in Rome two hundred and eighty-one years ago. A man whose tongue, pen, and body were alike untiring, who in Naples, Switzerland, France, England, Germany, and Venetia worked to make Freethought possible for us, who lay eleven long years in prison, who endured the rack and perished at the stake. True till death, the grand and glorious Giordano Bruno, whose ashes were scattered in Rome, but whose memory still lives, whose energy still survives, whose martyrdom we honor, and whose marble presentment we hope ere long to see challenging the Vatican with the promise of the Freethought victories which the twentieth century shall bring to crown the nineteenth century effort and to redeem the sixteenth century shame.

In France it was in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that the struggle was most fierce, and for some time least fruitful. The mass of the people fed too little to think much, and the work of the encyclopedist was as that of the sower on the rock so far as concerned the great mass of the nation. But the men who were imprisoned and whose books were burned during the Regency and in the reign of Louis XV. made possible the more general intellectual array of this century. Fewer giants, perhaps, but more men. The fire which burned Vanini in the beginning of the seventeenth century is quenched for ever; and, though the priestly hatred against Voltaire still lives, the wit they fear, and hate because they fear, has been fruitful mother of freer thought in France.

Holland and Germany have been mighty for thought-leading through Europe, from Spinoza to Kant, Fichte, and Feuerbach. In England, from Hobbes to Mill, a grand march of great thinkers. But it is not alone of the great thinkers we have here to take account; it is of the village orator, the local pamphleteer, the poor and often rough-mannered defender of the right of speech and of publication. These in turn have each and all had hard battles to fight. Jail for themselves; poverty and contumely for their familes. To be "Infidel" was worse than to be a burglar. For the "sinner" there was welcome by the pious; he might repent. For the heretic thinker, no mercy to be shown him. But the poorer soldiers have left scant personal record of their work. This work is best known by the platform and press which they have won for our use. Who shall tell in each land the histories of those humbler ones who have faced hunger and mockery, prison and shame, to win even the grudged freedom we enjoy to-day?

Mr. Bradlaugh was applauded often and vociferously. The people rose in their seats, swung their hats, waved their handkerchiefs, and shouted at the top of their voices. Mr. Bradlaugh is extremely popular with the Freethinkers of England.

After the principal speech, Mr. Bradlaugh gave out certificates and prizes to nearly fifty successful students of the Science Class who hav been taught by Dr. Aveling, Mrs. Besant, and the two Misses Bradlaugh. The students came up as their names were called, the science or sciences in which they had passed first and second class examinations were named, and the certificate or prize handed to each. The ceremony was impressive and elicited much interest. Dr. Aveling, Mrs. Besant, and the Misses Bradlaugh are deserving of great praise for what they are doing in teaching the practical, useful sciences, and in diffusing an active fondness for them among the intelligent masses.

Dr. Büchner then rose to address the audience, and was received with such cheering and clapping as for a time made speech impossible. When silence was restored the professor spoke in German, and his eloquent words were briefly interpreted by Mrs. Besant. Dr. Büchner said that he should not speak long, as he was using a language which would probably be understood by few present, but he desired to say how glad he was, in a crisis like the present, to see such a manifestation in favor of Freethought. He had not expected to find such a large gathering on the side of Freethought in this country, for although England was the land of Lyell, Huxley, Tyndall, and Darwin, it was also the land of prejudice and intolerance. There was too wide a gap between the learned and the masses; the learned were Freethinkers, while the unlearned were still left to be Christians. Hence it is that with so much wisdom there is also so much backwardness—so much prejudice. Still let them hope to the end, although the time was long and patience was tried while progress was so slow. Truth, said Dr. Büchner, must win in the end, for "truth is imperishable and it only needs to be discovered, not to be defended." I repeat the thanks I offered this morning—thanks for your welcome, which has deeply moved me. I know that it is not myself you greet so warmly, but the principle I represent—the principle of investigating nature honestly, without fear of God or of the results that may be found. It has been said that thus to work and to speak out fully what is found is dangerous. It is not so. Never yet has truth injured man; it has ever been useful when found, never harmful. We see the victory of Freethought, and may it reign!

Mrs. Besant, after dwelling on the value of Freethought and on the work it has to do, concluded as follows: Great is our rejoicing. We bring to the world a message different from that of the church. This preaches the fall as its message. We preach the rising of man. Man becomes more human year by year, each one taking part in his advancement. They point back; we look to the future. They speak of a dead Christ; we of the living saviors of man. They speak of how to die; we of how to live. Death must come, and we shall each meet it alone. We desire to learn how by our lives we may make the world brighter, happier, more free. Our gospel is the news that man has risen and may rise. "Paradise Lost" in the world of God; paradise found in the world of man. For the golden age of the past, when the gods walked with man, we substitue that of the future, when man shall be god-like in so far as god means good. Grown to maturity, love shall be everywhere and knowledge the milk and meat of all. There shall be books for the child of the very poorest and the time and the leisure for their use. Our brethren will go from us to many lands, leaving with us fresh hope and stronger hearts. Let them take this message: that England is on the side of Freethought; that in London so many hundreds of men can gather together to bid them good speed. They shall go hence from this federation as from the center of the world's Freethought bearing a message, not of peace where hatred lies concealed, but of love to all, whether they think with us or not, for we are sure that the work we are doing will make the world at length one vast republic of brethren upon equal grounds.

Mr. Symes was then called on, and was very warmly greeted.

Dr. Edward Aveling said that that meeting was a magnificent ending to a magnificent day. After the day's hard international work there was the evening's international rejoicing. What religion had failed to do Freethought should succeed in. On that platform were representatives of art, of science, of business, and of politics. For art they had music dear to Freethought, as well as graver studies. We had fighting to do, good hard-hitting fighting, such as that of his friend Symes. Men, women, and children all came to rejoice in the work that was being done. Science was represented there by one of her worthiest sons, a man who stood in the front rank of scientific men, but was not ashamed to come there and preside over a Freethought Conference. Knowledge was our strength; let it be with us guiding, leading, teaching, a living presence in our homes, purifying, and blessing all.

FOURTH SITTING, MONDAY, 11 A. M.

A delegates' meeting was held in the Minor Hall.

The Congress turned to its work—the adjourned discussion on the place of meeting for the next Conference. A long discussion followed, in which Dr. Schläger, Dr. Büchner, Dr. Aveling, MM. d'Ablaing, Bradlaugh, Jones, Frowein, Symes, Vancaubergh, and Mrs. Besant took part. Frankfort, Paris, and Amsterdam were put to the vote, which was taken by ballot. Result: Paris, with permission to go to Amsterdam if difficulties arose as to Paris. The date was then discussed, and the first half of September, 1882, was chosen. It was further decided that the Congress should sit for three days, and the Council of 1882 was instructed to make inquiries about towns willing to receive the Congress in 1883, and to report to the next Congress.

The Council was instructed to send letters in the name of the Congress to Italy and Switzerland, inviting the coöperation of the now scattered Freethinkers of those countries, and asking them to group themselves into societies and elect delegates to the General Council for 1882 before January 1st.

Dr. Edward B. Aveling was then called on to read the report from Canada, which he did.

I then read the following brief paper, by T. B. Wakeman, Treasurer of the National Liberal League:

The preceding report of our able and devoted secretary leads to two or three reflections which, under the light of our experience, ought to be submitted to Liberals at home and abroad:

1. That Liberalism is "in the air" and will appear from time to time in forms, shapes, persons, and places the most unexpected. Indeed, the general fact of the progress of the world makes their appearances inevitable. The Liberals are those who have become free, that is, emancipated from theology. The facts and laws of civilization compel this emancipation more and more.

2. Shall this process of progress and enlightenment be the result of blind facts, forcing events and revolutions like the broken and damned-up ice in a mountain gorge, or shall the process of progress be anticipated by a wise prevision and provision, that will open the minds of men to the inevitable and make the rise and flow in the river of time and evolution peaceful, healthy, and natural?

3. This wise prevision and preparation can only be had by the wise and prudent spreading of Liberal, scientific, and humane views among the people. To do this two things are necessary: (1) Careers for individuals; (2) Organization. That is to say, Liberalism must furnish a livelihood for its best teachers and exponents. The success of a cause that can furnish such careers is assured. The cause that cannot do it must remain suspended like vapor, "in the air," giving freshets here and lightning there under the blind propulsion of revolutionary events. The revolution, if it is understood, organized, and manned, is gradual and safe; it is but another name for the growth and progress of man. But man cannot advance physically, morally, socially, and politically without limbs and organs.

4. Back of these leaders, teachers, and editors there must lie organizations, intelligent, trusting, coöperative, influential. The National Liberal League is one of these; it must be largely extended, and others must take up its work and aid in its efforts for emancipation, education, and social development; and, above all, aid in the defense of liberty against encroachment of both church and state, by securing the complete and permanent separation of both.

5. The last consideration is that no Liberal can really be one until and unless he has an earnest desire to have others enjoy the blessed emancipation from the horrors, dogmas, dreams, and despotisms of theology from which he has escaped. He knows that this escape must be commonly a slow growth, not without the doubts and fears which always attend growth and progress. But he knows the joyous health and liberty beyond; and he longs to see all enjoy this blessed light. He knows, too, that only by that light can the progress of the world be other than a blind and dangerous groping and stumbling in the dark. It is evidently, therefore, the duty of every Liberal to secure his own life, family, and paying business upon the most successful and permanent basis possible, from the point of view of worldly success; and then, to use of his means reasonably, and in proportion to his means, for the wise support of the organization, and the men who only can make Liberalism a beneficial power upon earth.

These reflections are forced upon us by the fact that Liberals so often take a pride in despising money and position, as so much filthy lucre and hypocrisy. If sought for themselves, this is true. If sought as a power for good, it is the reverse of the truth. Unless the genius of Voltaire had been seconded by his wealth, he could never have lifted Europe out of the dark ages. Honestly, honorably, industriously, therefore, "put money in thy purse," for money is the power that propels the world forward in her orbit of progress. Each must learn and be able to contribute to that power. T. B. WAKEMAN, Treas. N. L. L,
93 Nassau street, New York.

M. Le Lubez formally reported the principles and work of the Union Democratique de Propagande Anti-clericale, of Paris, and expressed a hope that all the French groups would unite.

Mr. Holyoake asked whether Socialists were excluded from the Federation. He was referred to the rules which forbade any interference with the autonomy of any affiliated society, and informed that any member of the Federation might hold any views he or she pleased on any subject outside Freethought, but might not introduce them into the meetings or aims of the Federation.

FIFTH SITTING, MONDAY 8 P. M.

When the president had taken the chair a congratulatory telegram was read by the secretary from Dr. Hitchman, president of the Anthropological Society, Liverpool. Dr. Edward B. Aveling was then called on to open the discussion on "The Light Thrown by Modern Science on the Origin of Religious Ideas among Mankind." He read a very valuable paper.

M. d'Ablaing van Giessenburgh read a most admirable paper.

Dr. Hartogh Heys van Zonteveen then read a paper on the "Origin of Religious Ideas from the Point of View of Evolution."

Dr. Büchner, in spite of the speeches already delivered on the important question before them, desired to add a few words in conclusion. He did not think that the subject was well chosen, because science did not yet throw much light on the absolute origin of religious ideas. This was not yet possible, for we had here no certain knowledge. We had many theories, many hypotheses; but the fact that opinions were so unusually various showed that there was much uncertainty. Let us admit, then, that as yet we were not in a position to give a certain answer as to the origin, and let us consider what light could be thrown by science on religious ideas. The first thing to remember was the origin of man, the ages during which man has existed upon the earth. Here our knowledge is chiefly due to English thinkers; I need only mention Sir Charles Lyell. These have shown us that man is no new-comer on the earth, but is an old inhabitant. All the stories and traditions we have about him are, as to time, comparatively modern. We have not to do with thousands, but with hundreds of thousands, of years. Of this vast space of time, ere man reached the idea of spirit, we have no record. All that we can be sure of is that his thoughts were not a gift from heaven, but were the outcome of long, long generations of toil and of discovery, doubtful and confused. We cannot see far back, but we can see man in his helplessness, surrounded by the vast and irresistible powers of nature. They were so far greater than himself that he deemed them supernatural, and called these powers supernatural beings, gods. Here is the origin of the gods. Of all these natural forces and changes, one change, which happened day after day, made the deepest impression. It was the change of light into darkness, of darkness into light. The stars in the heaven above, the sun, the moon, were all mysterious; life flowed from them, all good came of them, and these heavenly influences were called divine. They were dressed up into gods —good gods. But in the night man was defenseless; he felt menaced by something at once terrible and strong. The night was alive to him, and perilous, and the darkness was full of spirits, evil and harmful. So spirits of light and darkness became spirits of good and evil. It was worthy remark that the adoration of demons—devils, we call them—was more widespread and more earnest than the adoration of the good. It would lead me too far to enter into full particulars, but I do not think, with M. d'Ablaing, that fetichism preceded light-worship; I think that sabaism is the earlier. Fetichism is a form of the fear of nature, the symbols imaging the thought of fear. In any case, the solar worship is the widest spread of all creeds, and has most influenced civilization; everywhere we find its symbols, in Germany, in France, in all lands, and these symbols are easy to be recognized. Reverence for the sun and light precedes worship of earthly bodies. Reverence for animals depends also on the relation of the animals to man, whether useful or harmful. The fear of the end of life made life a ceaseless wrestling. A great philosopher had said that death was the reason of all philosophy, and it is the reason also of theology, which is a philosophy although a bad one. Let us remember, in studying such a subject as this, that as far as our science may have gone, there remain very many gaps in it which we as yet are unable to fill, many limits which we are as yet unable to overpass. These gaps daily become smaller, and perhaps some day shall be known the whole chain of existence, the natural order of the world, so that none shall be able to shut his eyes to the great heritage of knowledge. God-belief shall then be destroyed by nature-knowledge. Reverence for man shall replace reverence for God. "Long enough have we believed; we desire at length to know." Ignorance is slavery; freedom from all slavery, religious, political, social, depends upon knowledge. The root of social and political slavery is in religious slavery; the chain of religion broken, all chains fall to pieces; win freedom from religion, and political freedom is yours. What are all the great forces in comparison with thought? The Roformation was the result of thought, and mark the changes, political and social, which resulted from it. Treasure, then, freedom of the mind, above all else. I believe that our work will grow; it is small now, but all things have small beginnings. I hope and I trust in the future. It has been said that "Few men think, but all will have opinions." Hence the slow progress of ideas. The power of religion depends on its giving certainty without thought; things will progress as man doubts and questions. Men will begin to strive for happiness here instead of hereafter. Hence the fear with which the unduly rich and powerful regard Freethought; they know that when men once think they will no longer remain contented in their misery, but will do away with inequality and injustice, and insist that each shall have a share in the happiness of the world. Let us throw our gaze onward into the future. The sunshine of that future we may not share, but let us comfort ourselves with the thought that life has a nobler mission for us than enjoyment; "life is not only to be enjoyed, it is an endless battle." In that battle each of us is a soldier, and let each thinker take this as my good-night.

A Trinity of Lithographs.

We hav for sale the lithograph likenesses of the three leading Liberals of this country—Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, and R. G. Ingersoll. They are all splendidly executed, and with a neat frame around them—which can be procured from picture-frame makers at slight expense—will be an ornament to any home. They will be sent, secure from breakage, by mail at the following prices: D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll, 50 cents each; Thomas Paine, $1.

LECTURE I.

From this last discovery follows our next or fourth harmony, that is,

IV.—THAT THE NEW WORLD AND COSMOS IS THE FOUNDATION OF A NEW, AS THE UNIVERSE WAS THE FOUNDATION OF THE OLD, FAITH.

It is the earth that revolves, and not the infinite starry space. Upon this bottom fact all are agreed now except the savages.

The sun is the light and life-giving center of the planets, and it and they move with almost incalculable speed in our infinity, of which motion as a whole is unthinkable. The "universe" and its creating God have vanished like a theater spectacle after the play is over. In their place appears the Cosmos, and beyond it the Infinite. This fact turns a new leaf in the history of human existence—turns from the old to the new. Strauss, in his invaluable work, "The Old and the New Faith," has presented this change so fully that we need not pursue it further. The Cosmos is a Greek word (kosmos) meaning order, thence beauty of order, thence ornament; or, as the poet says it,

"The starry treasures with which the All adorns itself."

It describes the world as it is knowable to man. We know it as the earth, the solar system, and all the stars, constellations, and depths of space which come within human ken. The telescope and our thought reveal this Cosmos, this ornament of the Infinite, floating in infinite space, which by the law of relation cannot be thought of but as an extension of it. We cannot escape the conclusion that this Infinite is the indefinite extension of matter, and of its changes and motions which we call forces. From the positions of matter we have the idea of space, and from its changes the idea of time.

The same laws of thought that compelled our fathers to think the revolving universe to be finite and limited compels us, under these new facts, to conceive the immensity of the starry spaces and their contents to be but the fringe or hither side of the Infinite. Imagination as well as thought and inquiry is needed to give meaning to these two words, Cosmos and Infinite. Let such works as Proctor's "Expanse of Heaven," "Our Place in the Infinities," or Flammarion's essay on the "Distance of the Stars," suggest the truths and the feelings which no words or figures can ever fully convey. Such phrases as the "intoxication" or "persecution" or "heartache" of the Infinite will then have some meaning. The "God-intoxication" of the "Atheist" Spinoza will become full of meaning. Yet, as Emerson reminds us, meditation upon the Immense and the Infinite is the medicine, not the food of the soul. Before it human pride, selfishness, and "immortality" may indeed be humbled. But to some, to whom such meditation has become habitual, it is like gazing over a precipice until awe changes to the desire to vanish into the All. The light as well as the shadow of Nirvana dazzles and blurs, and so hides the actual world from us. How safe and true the poet's monition to seek the Infinite only in and through the Finite! The finite world, or cosmos, is our shield to defend us from the Infinite. And the inner side of that shield, ornamented so beautifully, is it aught but our own painting? The answer to this question brings us to the next—

V.—THE FIFTH HARMONY OF SCIENCE; THE SCIENTIFIC ASSURANCE OF THE RELATIVITY OF ALL HUMAN KNOWLEDGE.

This is but the Copernican discovery repeated in the mind. The Infinite can no longer be in any way a knowable person or personality. It is without relation, unconditioned and unknowable. Those who wish to see that the highest intellects can make no more out of it can follow the investigation through the pages of Locke, Berkley, Hume, Kant, Sir Wm. Hamilton, Mansel, Huxley, Spencer, and Fiske. All human speculation as to the Infinite, the Absolute, the Unconditioned, the Eternal, the Unrelated, the Unknowable, the Incognizible, may be expressed by placing an interrogation mark within the circle of of Eternity. The wiser people are, the more content they become to leave the question there. The Agnostic position is the only one that science approves. But as to the inner side of the shield, the Cosmos itself, what do and what can we know? The answer is that we do and can only know it as it appears to us, that is, as phenonena (from Greek phenomenon, an appearance, from phainomai, I appear). In other words, the external world or the total mass of things about man are knowable to him only as modes of his sensation, that is, only as they appear to him. He connects them together by the succession and order of his sensations. The changes which are conceived of as following each other, that is, as successive, gave to mankind the notion of time, the relation of co-existence and of order gave them the notion of space. The other changes of sensation, by observation associated with phenomena, have given all of the secondary and even all of the primary qualities or attributes of matter, from color, taste, and weight, down to the first qualities of size, form, and resistance.

Thus the human race, in its progress upward to its present condition, has, by its experience and heredity, woven together the Cosmos from phenomena, and has hung it between itself and the Infinite. The Cosmos is man's creation painted by his life and his own sensations on the hither side of the Infinite, hiding it from us forever. Or, in other words, it is the survival in the human organization and brain of the experiences and triumphs of the strong of our race in their battle of life.

We shall doubtless be told that this relative view of the world is about as old as philosophy itself. And we strike out many quotations which we had gathered from sages old and new to that effect. But let it be remembered that in these and many similar instances science has come forward and has given a deep and exact meaning to old guesses, surmises, and opinions that their authors, as is evident from the context, never in any scientific sense understood. Yet nothing is pleasanter than to complete and appreciate the old wisdom by the light of the newer knowledge. To sum up we may say that it follows from this law of relativity:

1. That human knowledge is only of the Cosmos and of Man, and of Man's conceptions as to the Infinite.

2. That the Cosmos is, in its ultimate analysis, a human or subjective synthesis only; that is, man knows only man's world.

3. That truth is not a thing nor an entity, nor an inspiration nor a revelation from any divinity, but is man's method of looking at things and facts so that his thoughts may agree with them. It is the correspondence of thoughts with things.

4. That all theologies, universologies, and ontologies of every kind and description whatsoever, have become obsolete. As mankind becomes enlightened they will gradually and gladly bury them among the mythologies. That they may become valuable as poetic and illustrative material from the repository of the past history of our race we would be the first to admit and to show by use, but they can no longer be a part of verifiable knowledge called science.

We have already seen how the new astronomy led to the modern idea of the Cosmos; how that idea led to the doctrin of the relativity of human knowledge; and that from thence the Subjective Synthesis is an inevitable conclusion. This brings us to the next, the sixth harmony, viz.,

VI.—SCIENCE MUST BE DISTINGUISHED BETWEEN ITS OBJECTIVE AND SUBJECTIVE ASPECTS.

This is the first and all-important division of human knowledge, in regard to which much confusion continues.

It amounts to this: that while all of human knowledge is confessedly but a subjective synthesis; that is, a human reading and understanding made up of man's sensations, thoughts, and feelings, yet it is found that some of these correspond to what we call an external world—conceived of as outside of—that is, as placed over against or objective to—man.

Other sensations, thoughts, and feelings that do not correspond to any external order or world remain in, or related to, man as the subject, and are called subjective or purely human. And thus generally the aspect of Science or Philosophy which relates to the external world is called the objective aspect, while that which relates to man and his conceptions and uses is called the subjective aspect. There are thus two very different and very important ways in which the world is viewed. When considered as external to and independent of man it is called objective, and is quite a different world from that which appears under the subjective aspect. Under the latter it is considered chiefly (1) as merely the extension of man's sensations as a part of himself, or (2) in its relations to him and his needs, uses, and feelings.

The external world is considered objectively as extending from the Infinite through the Cosmos in to Man, who appears only as a product of it, though he may be its crown and conscious flower.

The subjective world is the reverse of the objective, and extends from Man, and as if a part of him or in relation to him, out through the Cosmos to the Infinite.

The objective aspect gives only the pure, cold, scientific, impartial question, Is it true? That is, what of our ideas or conceptions are verified, that is proved to be true by reason of their agreement with the objective order considered as external to man.

The test under the subjective aspect is the question, Is it good? Is it a part of man, tending to his use, advantage, and glory? These distinctions may seem simple now, but the history of philosophy is the story of the contention and conflict of these two methods of looking at and construing the world and man's conceptions concerning it.

By way of illustration and contrast, the preponderance and influence of each of these methods might be followed as a useful lesson in the histories of nations, peoples, races, and epochs of time, as well as in individuals.

The saying that "every person is born a Platonist or an Aristotlean" is merely to say that by temperament every one is inclined to the subjective or to the objective view of things. So in estimating races and peoples their tendency in this regard is often the key to their lot and fate on earth. The Hindoos and the Romans, for example, were both Aryans and polytheists. The former produced and were summed up in Brahma and Buddha, the latter in Cæsar and the Empire. The Greeks furnish illustrations of both tendencies. Indeed so well balanced were they as a people that neither of these views permanently dominated. But neither their philosophers nor states could ever agree and combine. Could they have been united under one firm, objective, Roman government—some long-lived Alexander—they would probably have conquered the world. Rome would have been impossible, and civilization have had a different and perhaps a better history.

Throughout history the subjective view appears as the mother or nurse of anthropomorphism and all "religions." But from thence, too, the fine arts have sprung, whence the ideals which dictate to the objective activities for what they shall labor, and how they shall modify the world in order to subject it to man's use and enjoyment.

These two ways of looking at things make, therefore, the two grand continents of knowledge, and are as unavoidable and therefore as old as thought itself. In the childhood of the race, as of each child now, the subjective method was predominant and unregulated. The world was alive to man and a part of himself. Gradually the objective gained strength and blocked out science after science. Finally, as we have seen, the triumph of objective science brought the subjective method under the scientific light that points out its true object and its human character and test of truth. Thus it is at last redeemed from the fog in which theology and metaphysics have enveloped it for thousands of years.

The world, considered as man's world and in relation to him, is subjective; considered independent of him, as simply observed by him, and no more, it is objective.

Lucretius, Shakspere, Goethe are objective poets. Dante, Milton, Byron, Wordsworth, Shelley, Victor Hugo are far more subjective in tendency and results.

But passing the poets, we find that the reconciliation of these reversible views of the world has been the crucial test of all philosophies and the torment of all philosophers ancient and modern. Does the world exist as anything more than a mode of man's sensation? Has it any order or sense except as related to man? Was it not created for him?

But reversely, is not man merely the product of the world? Would it not crush the whole human race as soon as a swarm of flies? Is not man an insignificant atom in its infinity?

Both views have a truth represented by great names. Subjective theology appeals, for instance, to Plato, Plotinus, Augustine, Leibnitz, Wolf, Hegel, and Cousin; the objective science to Democritus, Epicurus, Aristotle, Descartes, Bacon, and Humboldt. Sociology, the science of collective man; and psychology, the science of individual man, could only bring this philosophic conflict of the agee to a close. They do it, as we may see more clearly hereafter, by showing that the unity of these two views is in man himself as the center of All. The two aspects are simply the two modes of his own reading of his world. When he reads out from him it is subjective as if the world were but an extension of himself for himself. When he reads in towards him it is objective, and he is considered but a part of it and its product. Thus Man is the only solution of his world. He is the keystone of the arch of the sciences with its two sides which are the inevitable extensions of his objective sight and subjective feelings.

As a summary, then, we say:

The objective world is considered as the non-ego, the non-human, physical, material world of matter and motion, which mankind conceives as moving in mass or molecules according to laws which they can learn and so know as the true. The word true is the test that crystallizes the objective world into science.

The subjective is the world of man, of the ego, and the human uses thereunto attached, or regarded as belonging, in order to subserve human welfare. Science, let it be remarked and remembered, has reduced the subjective world and its clouds and chaotic; speculations to order by placing the word "good" as the test, polar star, and crystallizing center by and in which its notions are all judged and saved as useful, or are else rejected. This test gives to the ideal world, the spiritual world of emotion and imagination, a method and a character almost as scientific as the objective world of sensation, upon which it depends.

The objective looks at things as they are, the REAL.

The subjective looks or regards things as they ought to be, the IDEAL.

The one tells us what is true.

The other what is good.

But what is the origin, nature, and extent of human knowledge? That the next harmony will show us. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

A Letter from Parker Pillsbury.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Lately there died in Worcester, Mass., Mr. Stephen S. Foster, one of the most eminent of the Garrisonian abolitionists. Intimate acquaintance and association with him in various enterprises of reform and progress—temperance, peace, antislavery, and woman's equal rights, the principal—for a period of forty years enables me to say that for clear mental and moral vision, courage, faithfulness, perseverance, and deep devotion to what he believed to be for present and final human unfolding and felicity, I hav seldom seen his equal, never his superior.

At a large memorial service, held in Worcester soon after his burial, some facts were disclosed which I think can be made appropriate, as well as interesting, to your columns. The occasion brought a large congregation, Boston, Providence, New York, Dover, Concord, N. H,, and Concord, Mass., having representativs. Among the principal speakers were the Rev. Samuel May, a forty years' co-worker with Foster, Wendell Phillips, and Lucy Stone.

An important incident in Mr. Foster's antislavery history was the publication of a pamphlet of seventy-two pages, which he entitled "The Brotherhood of Thieves; or, a True Picture of the American Church and Clergy." Its sale reached more than twenty thousand copies, and was, you may be sure, twenty thousand lightning-flashes down into the bottomless pit of slavery's abominations.

Five years before this work appeared another had been issued by Hon. James G. Birney, entitled, "The American Church the Bulwark of American Slavery."

Judge Birney was a wealthy slave-owner in Kentucky, high in social position as well as in the government, and withal a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church, and so was certainly entitled to attention when he spoke and wrote against slavery.

Becoming profoundly convinced of the exceeding sinfulness and guilt of slave-holding, he brought all his slaves into Ohio, emancipated them, and settled them on free scil, where to this day some of them liv, and always hav lived, in plenty and prosperity.

Then he settled in Cincinnati, published his tract, established an antislavery newspaper, which was twice mobbed and his press and types thrown into the Ohio river. And these were but part of the indignities and outrages he and his family suffered at the hands of the ecclesiastical "bulwarks of American slavery" and the reverend "Brotherhood of Thieves," as the American church and clergy proved themselvs to be in the stunning pamphlets of Judge Birney and Stephen Symonds Foster.

I say, as the American church and clergy proved themselvs to be. For a peculiarity of both these mighty testimonies was that church and clergy both spoke entirely for themselvs; both told their own stories in their own spoken, written, and printed words; they were not even cross-questioned, and they gave every word of it in their own courts and councils; in other words, in their own general assemblies and presbyteries; their own general and annual conferences; their own congregational associations and consociations; their own American boards of missions, home and foreign; their own Bible and tract societies, and other lesser, but not less important, utterances, repeated year after year.

And the denominations designated in the Birney or Foster pages were the Presbyterian, Congregational, Episcopal, Baptist, Methodist, Free Will Baptist, Unitarian, and Universalist.

Before me is a copy of "The Brotherhood of Thieves." I wish there was a copy in every American household, that it might be seen whether our testimony against the churches and priesthood was ever any worse than they bore against themselvs, or whether our title pages were not warranted by every other page the books contained.

Another of these works, of exactly the same character, was issued a few years later, entitled, "The Church as It Is the Forlorn Hope of Slavery."

This was after the popular sentiment had begun to be powerfully affected by the antislavery agitation, at least outside of the church and pulpit, and so there was good and special reason for naming this last apocalyps, "The Forlorn Hope of Slavery."

Slavery, seeing every other refuge failing, in its desperation, like the young aspirant to the throne of David, rushed into the sacred temple and "laid hold on the very horns of the altar."

My object in thus presuming on your crowded columns, Mr. Editor, is to say, chiefly, that just what the clergy proved themselvs in the chattel slavery times they are still, so far as they hav opportunity and ability.

On my desk is a printed sermon preached last April in Cincinnati by Rev. Dr. Boynton, of Washington, and printed at full length in the Cincinnati Commercial of, I think, Monday, 4th of April, 1881. In that discourse a stranger to our country and history would never doubt—never—that slavery was abolished solely by the church and priesthood, and could hav been done much sooner but for the profane and impertinent interference in the work of "Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and the motley party—embracing all the fanaticism of that time—who followed them."

Judging the whole body by this one specimen, Boynton, Mr. Fostor should hav added to this title the word "liars," and thus let it tell the whole story, "The Brotherhood of Thieves and Liars; or, a True Picture of the American Church and Clergy."

And I sometimes am compelled to believe that the word "liars" should be retained, even were the "thieves" left off.

The persistence with which the clergy continue to blacken the name and memory of Thomas Paine, even unto this hour, might be one of the most convincing proofs of their own doctrin of total depravity which their whole theological literature could produce. And their hydrophobic bite affects even our magazine writers and authors still.

I gave my lecture the other evening on Thomas Paine, and had just time to copy into it the following, with which I will close this, I fear, sufficiently extended article.

I see that a writer in Scribner's Monthly of last November, Joseph B. Gilder, in an article entitled, "Bordentown and the Buonapartes," steps out of his way to gild the old slanders against Thomas Paine, sneering him, of course, with the other vulgar, as Tom Paine.

Paine owned and occupied a small house at Bordentown. One day he received a most cordial and friendly letter from Gen. Washington to visit him; which letter Gilder copies into his article.

But this is what he says in his Scribner article:

"Paine's favorit resort (at Bordentown) was the bar-room of the Washington House; and visitors to that ancient hostelry are told that nothing but brandy and Atheism ever passed his lips."

In Scribner's for February following is an answer to this scoffing outrage, by a well-known English writer, Edward Linton, to this purport:

"Forty years ago, I was employed to write a life of Thomas Paine. Knowing nothing of the man, I was careful to examin everything for or against him. I was in communication with men who had personally known him. I found him to be a typical Englishman—honest, courageous, constant, a lover of justice, man of the real old and New England strength, religious according to her light, magnanimous, it may be, in attacking what seemed to him error, but at least more tolerant than his opponents, and withal, benevolent and generous. . . . Paine was neither brandy-drinker nor Atheist. Against the Atheism, his own writings are sufficient evidence. Throughout his works, especially his 'Age of Reason' and his 'Thoughts on a Future State,' there is proof that, though not believing in Christianity, nor the Bible, he was a steady Theist—what in those days was known as a Deist, as distinct from the Unitarian, who accepts the authority while denying the divinity of Christ.

"In his will Paine directs that his adopted sons shall be instructed in their duty to God. . . . Before me is a letter from Paine, written to a friend who was coming to visit him, in which he writes thus:

"'When you come to see me, you must take such fare as you find. I liv upon tea, milk, fruit, pies, plain dumplings, and a piece of meat when I can get it.' . . . Paine must hav made something of himself, and hav acquired some decency of behavior, to become the friend of Dr. Franklin, Jefferson, La Fayette, and Washington, and for a time the companion of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, living with him in the same house in Paris; and to whom Lord Edward wrote under date Oct. 30, 1792:

"'I lodge at the same house with my friend Mr. Paine. We breakfast, dine, and sup together; and the more I see him in his interior, the more I like and respect him. I cannot express how kind he is to me. There is a simplicity of manners and goodness of heart about him, and a strength of mind which I never knew a man before to possess."

So much for the reply of Mr. Linton to the Scribner-Gilder article.

It may not be worth your crowded columns, but as it is comparativly new testimony against the blasphemies of the Christian church and pulpit, I venture to transcribe and send it. The clergy had their say about Paine almost unchallenged for more than half a century, and the friends of truth and justice should lose no good opportunity at refutation. I sometimes think, however, that a character like that of Paine may be demeaned and degraded when we attempt to rescue it from charges made by such a world as ours. For my own part, I never doubt that time or eternity will vindicate or magnify the right. And to me, time and eternity are one and the same.

PARKER PILLSBURY.

A Protest.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your answer to the Rev. J. Smith upon the ark story, you were rather severe upon persons who believe in God. It may not be more than is deserved by those who not only believe in an old impossible God, but would enforce their belief upon others by the threat of eternal damnation; but is does not follow that there is no logical ground for a belief in a power who controls the destinies of men; and without any desire to persuade any one, but as a small contribution to truth-seeking, I would like to have you publish the following communication.

One of the most important results of the advance of science is the growing belief in what is called the unity of nature, or that the same laws regulate all known things. It is found that as far as we know the same physical laws control all the planets and stars as well as our earth, and upon our world we find a few well-defined laws regulating all things. There is but one law for reproduction, and but one law of nutrition, modified to suit all living things in the diferent positions they occupy in the scale of development. To point to later discoveries, I could refer to the last discoveries upon atoms and molecules.

Now there is another law which we find everywhere on this earth. It is that wherever a result is to be attained, there is a controling mind to direct the sufficient agents. Thus animals hav a mind to direct their sight, hearing, and physical powers so as to enable them to find their food and rear their young. Men hav the same directing mind. Where it is located, no one can positivly tell; how it acts, we can only guess But there is within man a mind to combine together all his powers to accomplish any desirable result within the reach of the means under his control. If we extend our investigations to more complex efforts, such as can accomplish greater results by the combined efforts of many men, we find the same law—there must be a controling and directing mind to enable them to be successful. Thus the farmer in the cultivation of his field, the architect in erecting buildings, the merchant in his enterprises, the manufacturer in his factory, can succeed only as one mind, and a capable one, directs the efforts of the agents employed in the work; but those minds are not omnipotent; they are circumscribed within certain laws, well defined, and which cannot be broken with impunity.

Then if this law of a directing mind necessary to achieve results holds good, as far as we can ascertain, in the details of this world, we are justified in the belief that the same law holds good in regard to the earth as a whole, as undoubtedly we must acknowlege both design and result. The design is the civilization of the earth, the gradual unfolding by man of all the powers of nature, and the result is slowly coming in sight of the barely awakened intelligence of men.

If this is true, it can be proved; and if we accept civilization and progress as the results sought for by this controling power, we can see many results which have taken place, which cannot be explained upon any evolutiv power of blind matter.

I will state two such events within the recollection of your readers. Twenty-five years ago, slavery, that great blot upon the civilization of the United States, seemed more firmly anchored than it had ever been before; its friends were aggressiv, its enemies despondent; all the latter hoped for was to confine its limits to the Southern states. When the war broke out, no one dreamed of abolition, and even Lincoln declared that the government had no such object in view. For two years the North was defeated, but from the time the Emancipation Proclamation was issued the fortunes of war changed, and the freedom of the negroes was the result of the war. Was it chance? Was it the work of inanimate matter? Or was it the well-worked-out design of a directing mind?

Again, in 1870, it seemed as if the hope of a republic in France was entirely dead; Napoleon III. was in the hight of his power; his son, a promising youth full of life. As far as the human eye could see, the Napoleon dynasty was secure upon the throne. A foolish war was the cause of its downfall, and unexpectedly to all a republic was established upon its ruin, raised through many difficulties, and its greatest danger, in the person of Napoleon IV., dissipated by his unexpected death in a skirmish in an insignificant war.

It may all be chance for people who believe in chance, but it is not according to any known laws for people who believe in nature's laws.

The personal experience of many a man or woman can furnish many an example of such events, which cannot be explained by any knowledge, and must be attributed to a lucky chance or the guidance of a directing mind.

It is the unconscious belief that there cannot be such results as we see every day around us without a controling mind somewhere that is at the foundalion of the religious beliefs of all nations and all ages. Upon this unconscious belief ignorance and superstition have built many a foolish structure, designing men hav used it to enslave the more simple souls that surround them, but science is slowly destroying their work. How much will remain when this work of of destruction has been completed, no one can tell. The certainty of immortality, the future punishment and reward of man, the devil, the special love of God for man, the omnipotence of God, the infallibility of the Bible, the morality founded upon the revealed word of God, all will hav to go and much more with it; but I, for one, doubt that they can ever prove that all that surrounds us here has taken its present shape and form, and is steadily advancing to a higher and better state, unless some controling mind has the direction and is guiding it to its final result. ALBERT CHAVAMRES.

VAN BUREN, ARK., Oct. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find an order for $7—$5 for the Round-the-World trip and the rest for the book you wrote me about. Yours, J. R. NEAL.

SOUTH CHAMPION, N. Y., Oct. 23, 1881.

DEAR EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for Mr. Bennett's Round-the-World trip. Wishing him success at home and abroad, I remain, Yours, MRS. DAVID ANDRUS.

MT. VERNON, IND., Oct. 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I hand you draft for $8 to be applied as follows, $5 for my subscription to the Round-the-World fund, and $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully, A. ED. HARLEM.

EUREKA, NEV., Oct. 19, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed post-office order for $8—three for THE TRUTH SEEKER and five for the Round-the-World fund to be credited to N. L. Hughes, of Eureka, and oblige, G. L. GREEN.

POLO, MO., Oct. 24, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Please find $5 for your forthcoming books, "A Trip Around the World." I hope you may arrive safe at home and liv many years to edit THE TRUTH SEEKER. May health, happiness, and rosperity be the reward for your labors!

Respectfully, W. W. SEELY.

HUDSON, O.. Oct. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav inclosed post-office order for $8—$3 of it to renew my subscription to your paper, and $5 for your book, Mr. Bennett's travels Round the Globe. Yours truly, MORRIS JOHNSON.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Oct. 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Your article, "As the time slips by we are reminded of—" reminding me of arrears, I at once inclose remittance in renewal of annual subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also (though not previously a subscriber to the fund) a remittance for the Round-the-World trip of the absent truth-seeking publisher. Respectfully, W. H. SHELDON.

SIOUX FALLS, Oct. 23, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find a post-office order, No. 11,163, for ten dollars, dated Sioux Falls, Oct. 15th, in favor of D. M. Bennett, which you will please apply as follows: "The Mair and Bennett Debate," $1.50; "Origin of Species," by Charles Darwin, $2.00; George Chainey's Lectures, $1.00; "More Criticism on Darwin," by Huxley, $1.50; and for the rest you will please enroll the name of John Limbeck, Sioux Falls, as a subscriber to Bennett's Around-the-World fund.

Yours truly, N. S. JOHNSON.

DENVER, COL., Oct. 23, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money order for eight dollars, five of which is to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the other five for Bennett's Trip Around the World. I must say I am very much interested in Bennett's letters. It is surprising to me how he manages to pick up so much information in just passing through a country. I presume many of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remember how conclusivly Dr. Higbee proved last spring that Pike's Peak was a burning volcano. Owing to sickness in my family I was for a long time unable to reply, and it has run on until now. I presume the doctor has learned ere this that he was the victim of a canard. It ought to hav been replied to long before this, as some may still be laboring under the delusion that Pike's Peak is really a burning volcano.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER abundant success, I am

Yours truly, IRA A. SCOTT.

CALEDONIA, D. T., Oct. 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav watched the Round-the-World fund ever since the fives began to come in, but it is too small a list yet. Oh, say, Liberals, out with your fives, and you will hav in return the best description of Round-the-World travel you ever heard, a good deal better than if you were going the same way. All this you will hav for the small sum of $5. Now it is no longer hard times. Labor is high; wages good. Farmers get a good price for their wheat, so we hav no excuse. Pardon me for not sending in my "V" before for Mr. Bennett's Round-the-Word Trip, and for the same you will put me in the altogether too short list. To-day I got a new trial subscriber, and I will try and get some more next time you hear from me. Please send me Mr. Bennett's life-size lithograph. I hope Mr. Bennett will enjoy himself on the long journey and will come home all safe and sound.

Yours truly, LEWIS MUNTER.

KIPTON, OHIO, Oct. 9, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Myself and wife sailed from London, England, in the good ship Victoria on the 15th day of September, and after an extremely rough and really perilous voyage a part of the way, landed at New York on the 30th ult. We left Mr. Bennett at London, writing, and waiting for the Freethinkers Congress that was to convene on September the 25th. We were urged to stay and attend it, but felt that I must hasten home and forego the pleasure and profit of the occasion. I called at THE TRUTH SEEKER office after landing at New York, but on the afternoon of my call, you, Mr. Editor, were out on a yachting excursion, just the recreation and airing that is good for a knight of the quill and types. Mr. Bennett informed me of some marked improvements and benefits in favor of the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER he hopes to perfect if he makes his great journey safely and successfully. And now, having penned all I hav the right to impose upon your columns, I desire you to allow me to append what I call an excellent and well-timed paper upon the efficaciousness of prayer, which I clipped from the columns of the Hudson (Mich.) Gazette, a live, newsy paper in which a discussion has for some time been carried on between the writer of the appended article, who signs himself "Liberal League," who wields a polished and able pen, and who is an out-and-out Liberal of the first water, and his antagonist in the debate, an able minister who signs himself "Spectator." But I hav noticed that others of the orthodox fraternity hav been so exercised by the truths and keen intellectual thrusts of "Liberal League" that they hav been wrought up to volunteer a few articles to help the hard fortune of "Spectator." Most truly, T. S. ANDREWS.

IS PRAYER EFFICACIOUS?

"Again I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my father which is in heaven."—Christ to his disciples, Matthew xviii, 10.

"Then shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me, and I will hearken unto you."—The Lord to his prophet Jeremiah, xxix, 12.

"I cry unto thee and thou dost not hear me; I stand up and thou regardest me not."—The experience of Job, xxx, 20.

"The cloud so long pending over the nation has at last burst upon our heads; we sit, half crushed, amid the ruin it has wrought; a million prayers, and hopes and tears, as far as human reason sees, were vain."—Rev. F. D. Powers.

EDITOR Gazette: When our President, Garfield, received the assassin's bullet, and was slowly and painfully fading away from its effect, no people on earth could hav followed the above advice of Christ, and the Lord through his propthet Jeremiah, more faithfully than the people of this country. Not only "two" but "millions" agreed touching what they asked to be done for Garfield, yet all "were vain." How, then, shall we view these Bible promises in their relation to the physical universe? Faith herself is blind and staggering! Shall we still cling to her powerless arms? Shall we say with Job, "I cry unto thee and thou dost not hear me?" or shall we say, plainly and candidly, what science and experience teach, that this is a practical world; that man's duty to himself is to lean upon himself as far as powers inherited and acquired will permit, and beyond that to repose with calm confidence in the unknown? Tears and sobs of a bereaved woman will assuage her grief; the spoken prayer may soothe the supplicant, but the laws of nature never stop to hear the sigh or prayer. Their cold philosophy may seem barren to a grieved heart; but is it not better to put our lives in accord with truth and fact, if they do seem harsh to the finer feeling, than to hug the blind delusions of primitiv ages? Natural laws are universal, invariable, and unbending. They never feel the pulsations of sensativness; they never vibrate to tender emotions; they never yield to human wishes or human greatness. A well-sent bullet destroy the organic structure of the man exalted as readily as a clown. One reason why vice and misery do not diminish in proportiou to preaching is because the natural laws are too much overlooked, and very rarely treated by ministers as having any relation to practical conduct. Religion, to be useful, should be founded on them. They require obedience to themselvs, and independent of them the moral law requires obedience to itself. Is not this the great lesson to be learned from the life and death of President Garfield? HUDSON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

MR. GREEN'S LECTURE TRIP.

NASHVILLE, Oct. 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: This beautiful autumnal day I am enjoying the home and hospitality of one of your subscribers, Lemuel Smith, of this town, an intelligent, worthy man, who, with his Liberal and good wife, are respected by all who know them; and any one traveling through the country will learn this fact—that the Freethinkers in every place are the very best part of the community. And, as an orthodox person once said to me, "Of course, Infidels hav to be honest, for they hav nothing else to depend upon," and it would be well for some orthodox people if they depended more than they do on honesty and less on the "blood of the lamb."

In this village they hav a Liberal association, known as the Nashville Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists. In this state the Liberal state association is named "The Michigan Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists." I do not like that name, for it appears to be an implied admission that the Spiritualists of Michigan are not Liberals, and I don't believe that. Those whom I hav become acquainted with since I came here I find to be decidedly Liberal.

The Liberal association of this village, I think, will soon decide to take out a charter as an auxiliary Liberal League. In that capacity its influence for good will be much greater. All Liberal associations should do so, and then be represented at the annual congress. I speak in the Opera House in this place this evening, and on Sunday evening next at Charlotte, some eighteen miles from here. On Sunday evening last I had the privilege of speaking for the association of Spiritualists and Liberals of Grand Rapids. The Liberal society there is large and energetic, and has a very pleasant hall to meet in.

Two weeks ago the Spiritualists held a large and enthusiastic meeting at Grand Rapids that, on account of the ability and earnestness of its speakers, attracted much attention in the city and vicinity. I find the Spiritualists are very numerous in Michigan, and are composed of a most respectable and intelligent body of people.

On Wednesday evening of this week I lectured in the Court House at Hastings, Michigan, to a respectable audience. What it lacked in numbers it made up in ability, and that is the case with Liberal audiences generally. I remember when the Watkins Convention was in session James Parton said to me one afternoon while we were sitting on the platform in the park: "Mr. Green, just look at that audience; I am proud of it. Did you ever see so many good heads together before? How do you think it would compare with an ordinary orthodox gathering?" And so it is everywhere. If the orthodox party can count the most noses, we can count the greatest amount of brains. I found some good working Freethinkers at Hastings. For many years I hav known George Smith, of Hastings, as one of the best workers in our cause to be found in Michigan, and I hav had a delightful visit with him and his family, composed of his intelligent father and mother, and brother Sam and sister Millie, all of whom are stanch Liberalists and great admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. For the benefit of some of our young men in the Liberal ranks I will take the liberty of saying that I heard this fine-looking, intelligent girl of twenty years say, "I am not going to get married until I come across some worthy young man who is an out-and-out Freethinker." I hope I hav not violated in the least the hospitalities of this pleasant home by mentioning this very sensible observation. I found also in Hastings other live Liberals, two of whose acquaintance I made, namely, C. H. Boner, Esq., an attorney, and Prof. J. W. Custis, a popular temperance lecturer, who is considering the subject of taking the Liberal lecture field. And I hope that so soon as our Liberal lecture bureau is established we shall be able to giv all such persons steady paying employment. Humanity everywhere needs their labors. Liberals heretofore hav been so weak in numbers and hav had such a foe to contend with that they hav found little time for anything but argument and discussion. But now that we are organizing societies in all parts of the country that with many must take the place of the old church, we should try and find time to cultivate music and singing for our gatherings. Mrs. Burns's new Liberal hymn-book is a good collection, and should be used at present at all our gatherings; and I wish she could be so encouraged in her good work that she could afford to set the words in her hymn-book to popular music. Will not some Liberal person who has property send Mrs. Burns one hundred dollars for that purpose? Then we should encourage all our good singers as well as our good speakers.

Mr. Peck added very much to the interest of the Hornellsville Convention and the Chicago Congress by his instrumental and vocal music, and he should be liberally encouraged in his good work. Some people who were not entirely rid of their inherited orthodoxy thought some of his songs too irreverent, and that they might grate harshly on the ears of church people. But I think Liberals hav always had to stand considerable grating. I don't know, but it may be right some time to let our "good" Christian friends know how it feels.

I can't close this communication without mentioning the good that J. H. Burnham has done in the state. Everywhere that I go I hear him well spoken of. He is called "the Ingersoll of Michigan." Ever since he left the Methodist pulpit he has been a most faithful worker in "our vinyard." And I learn that for years before he left the church he was the most popular preacher in the Methodist ranks in this state, at one time the presiding elder of his district. He should not only speak in Michigan, but in every state in the Union. The members of the New York Freethinker's Association will bear me witness as to his eloquence and ability.

But the great gun that has just been fired into the orthodox ranks is Col. Ingersoll's last article in the November number of the North American Review. It will sweep down regiment after regiment of the army of superstition, and its reverberation along their ranks will strike terror to every soldier in the "army of Zion." And I happen to know that the great Judge Black has surrendered. The great "policeman" has laid down his orthodox club and has retreated from the field of conflict. Who will be the next champion?

Col. Ingersoll wrote this article, I learn, immediately after his and Black's articles appeared in the Review, and sent it to the Review for publication, but the publishers did not wish to publish it until Judge Black had written another reply to go with it. They waited over one or two issues for Black's paper, and at last told Col. Ingersoll that if Black did not put in an appearance before the November number was out they would publish Ingersoll's article alone. And as Black failed to "come to time," they kept their word, showing that the publishers of the Review hav some independence.

I think nothing has appeared during the last hundred years of more value to the Liberal movement than Col. Ingersoll's last article. It is worthy of the great man who penned it. H. L. GREEN.

LYONS, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1881.

FRIEND MACDONALD: The lithograph of Ingersoll received. I am very much pleased with it. 'Tis better than I had expected. Please send me the same of D. M. Bennett, as I shall order frames for both to-day. Every apostle of liberty should hav both.

Yours for liberty and truth, L. J. WHITLOCK.

LIBERAL, MO., Oct. 23, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The posters you sent were received in due time. I posted one in Liberal Hall, at Liberal. I hav taken a few trial subscribers to your paper, and hope to be able to send you still more. Yours truly, JAMES H. ROBERTS.

NEW HOLSTEIN, WIS., Oct. 24, 1881.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: By the kindness of a mutual friend and subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER (Calvin Otis is his name) I hav been a constant but non-paying reader of your paper. I must confess it is the best paper of its kind that has ever come to my notice, and one that I hav read with greater interest than any other; even the German Freidenker edited in Milwaukee cannot boast of one-fourth so much Liberalism as is found in the pages of your valuable journal. You hav given every one a chance for debate in your columns, Liberals as well as orthodox, but why should I repeat that praise which every one of your readers knows you richly deserve?

I regret to say that most of the population of this town having come from the German Fatherland, and not being instructed in the English language, cannot read your paper (with some exceptions); otherwise the most of them are well educated, well read, and what is best, very Liberal in their views, which may account for the fact that we hav a church here but no pastor, because attendance is so very small. To the contrary, we hav two fine theaters, where amateur troupes play for the amusement of others and their own every Sunday night before a large attendance. Also for the purpose of Liberal thoughts and free debate there is a large Turn Hall, where we often listen to German lecturers on the topics of Freethought and other reforms.

You hav sent the paper heretofore to Mr. Calvin Otis. He having gone to New York to visit some of his friends in June last, let me hav his share in the paper. He has not returned yet, and his subscription was up October 1st. So I concluded to take his place, and will pay up from October 1st for one year, for which please find inclosed three dollars. I do not know when friend Otis will return. When he does he will notify you and probably renew his subscription. He is a stanch friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, more so to Mr. D. M. Bennett, and a bitter enemy to Anthony Comstock. If I hav taken up too much of your valuable time by this somewhat long letter you will kindly excuse. I wish to become acquainted with you and assure you of my good wishes as your true friend. GUSTAV HOBERG,

PORTLAND, ME., Oct. 25, 1881.

MR. MACDONALD: I rejoice to think that many of the Liberal-minded people of New England intend meeting at Paine Hall, Boston, on the 29th of next January to celebrate Thomas Paine's birthday, and at the same time organize a New England Freethinkers' society. Such a society well organized and meeting in Paine Hall once or twice a year and holding four or five days' meeting will, I trust, add thousands to the Liberal army of our country. I am in for the fight, and I do not intend to lay my armor down until I, with other Liberal people who think for themselvs, drive the seventy thousand cowards from their castles and their pulpits are cleansed and filled by such men as Col. Ingersoll and George Chainey, men who dare speak the truth and meet the truth in investigating fields of battle. I remain yours for the truth and the right, H. A. LAMB, M. D.

WHAT IS LIBERALISM?

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., Oct. 6, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long time since I saw a TRUTH SEEKER until a few days since. I am sorry to acknowledge I am still in arrears. Financial disappointments, bad trades, moving, sickness, doctor's bills, etc., are my excuses, and, whether satisfactory or not, must be accepted until I can get something ahead.

I see that Liberals are still divided as to platform. This arises from the fact that Liberals as a rule hav not learned what constitutes Liberalism. Liberalism is not Atheism, Deism, Spiritualism, or Christianity. To be a Liberal you must simply be liberal regardless of your religious, political, medical, or other opinion. Christians generally are illiberal; Infidels can be. Liberalism means free speech, free press, free discussion, and respect for all honest opinions. That is a platform all Liberals will accept in practice as a rule. Now we differ on many points. Why fall out about it? A resolution passed by a convention, unless in conflict with platform, is no just cause for a bolt. When in conflict with platform it is no longer a Liberal convention, but an illiberal one. Then true Liberals hav a right to withdraw. But a resolution consistent with platform compromises not the character of the convention nor the character of the minority vote. As there is nothing to hinder a Christian from becoming a Liberal, what if our Christian friends were to join us in sufficient numbers to constitute a majority of our Leagues and conventions, and were to pass resolutions extolling Christianity or the Bible, would skeptics hav anything to fear or withdraw about? On the other hand, if our Christian friends composed a respectable minority, and a resolution was passed saying the Bible was unfit for family reading, would we not think our Christian members small potatoes if they bolted? What say our Liberal friends of this platform? O. JONES, THEOLOGY ON THE DEATH OF GARFIELD.

MR. EDITOR: The public are taught that ministers are endowed with a divine afflatus that emanates from the great Godhead of the universe, so that their teachings and statements hav far greater significance than those originating elsewhere in mortal brain. This being true, the confused, contradictory, and absurd statements in their recent addresses and sermons, on the death of President Garfield, are most remarkable. They undoubtedly are desperately alarmed at the peculiar attitude of "Almighty God" in refusing to answer their prayers, even though offered when assembled as a nation in their temples of worship. The people demand, or should, to know, not only who is responsible for that murderous deed, but also why "Almighty God" has not kept his promises. The speculation the clergy are compelled to indulge in as to why their prayers as well as other millions of earnest souls for the life of President Garfield were not answered, must indeed be humiliating to them, and especially to those claiming to hav the divine afflatus direct from the great fountain-head of divinity itself. Some, however, do not speculate, but boldly speak as those "having authority."

The Rev. Dr. Van Wagener, of Niagara Falls, boldly asserts that "the devil, or evil one, killed Garfield," and that Almighty God simply "permitted it," that good might come to the people. Of course we are to understand that the certain good God had in view could not come in any other way than through this cruel, murderous deed. The devil, then, or evil one, is just as necessary and as lively to day as he was in the Garden of Eden. It seems "Almighty God" can't run this world or this government without the aid of the devil.

There was no way possible for mankind to receive knowledge except through the devil, and to-day God can find no other way to bestow his blessings or accomplish a certain good, except by permitting the devil to kill Garfield through the instrumentality of the villain Guiteau.

With all the devil's cunning is it not singular he does not discover what "Almighty God" is driving at, and cease to work for him? Such a peculiar partnership as God and the devil are running looks very curious, to say the least. Those ministers who hav thanked "Almighty God" for prolonging the sufferings of poor Garfield undoubtedly agree that the devil was permitted to use Guiteau to kill Garfield. Guiteau himself claims he was inspired of heaven; and the admission that God intended to accomplish a certain good proves that Guiteau was right and that, Van Wagener being correct, the devil was just as much inspired as Guiteau.

Rev. Dr. Poole, of Detroit, in this connection says, "There are no failures with God's plans and providences," therefore the fiat went forth from Almighty God that Garfield must die, and we shall as certainly receive the promised blessing; there can be no failure.

Let us now thank Almighty God for the devil, for Guiteau, and for the murder of our noble President.

Rev. Dr. Poole also states that "answers to prayers cannot be expected that ask a violation of known laws." Therefore as soon as the autopsy proved the wound was mortal from the first, we see how utterly useless it was to pray for the life God could not giv.

The Rev. Dr. Groves, of Grand Rapids, tells the people that Garfield was providentially nominated and providentially killed, that the people might be chastised. This is certainly consistent, for after reading Almighty God's bloody dealings with the Israelites and other nations, in the days of Moses and Joshua, it is easy to believe he would employ such a villian as Guiteau to kill our President. Again, Rev. Dr. Groves tells us he prayed daily and fervently for the life of Garfield, but God knows best, and was able to do as he pleased.

Now, if God does know best, why did this reverend doctor presume to instruct him as to what he ought to do, and tease him as he did? Again, if this reverend doctor of souls prayed amiss, or for what God could not, or would not, grant, is it not plain that Almighty God does not recognize his pretensions to being his divinely appointed mouthpiece? Or if, as Dr. Groves claims, he is one of the anointed, and he prayed as he said, it must hav been without faith, so much even "as a grain of mustard seed," or Jesus Christ told a falsehood when he said nothing shall be denied, even mountains shall tumble into the sea, in answer to prayer.

If Jesus had said, "Ye must not seek to instruct God, or tease him, for 'he is a jealous God,' has plans of his own, and will not change them any more, as he did for Moses & Co.," or, "he will not, because he cannot, interfere with, or suspend, natural law," these great reverend doctors would not hav to do so much wrestling with the "great unknown," and the intelligent, thinking, progressiv people of the nineteenth country would be spared the insult of being asked to believe such absolute nonsense.

Again, would it not be wise for these reverend doctors, in order that they might be saved these humiliating failures, to find out, if possible, just those prayers and petitions Almighty God will answer, and those he will treat with contemptuous silence, also when he is in his happiest moods, so that they (the people) and especially the government may know what to pray for and when to pray? It seems to me governors of states especially ought to be posted in this department of theology, so that when they set apart a day for the public to pray, etc., the petitions of a whole state or states may not be thrown contemptuously into Almighty God's waste basket. A little forethought on the part of Jesus Christ in classifying prayers proper and prayers improper would hav made a vast difference. It is altogether probable, as I see it, that Almighty God centuries ago ceased absolutely to sort the prayers of his people, and yet this farce of praying and wrestling with Almighty God 'goes on without a limit of the divine displeasure which, like a great black cloud, overshadows the great white throne above. It is quite as probable that God takes as little notice and cares as little for the fulsome and electrotyped praises and gluttonous thanksgivings of his self-constituted representativs, etc., on earth as he does their prayers.
